On the New Year's Threshold

Now, Lord, as softly breathes the wind
The requiem of the dying year,
Our mingled thoughts we cast behind,
As night's black pall falls o'er the bier;
Accept our praise from hearts sincere,
For mercies through another year.

Upon the New Year's threshold, Lord,
With throbbing, anxious hearts we stand,
Fearing to tread the "unexplored"
Without thine own almighty hand
To guide; O Lord, we pray to thee
To guide and guard us constantly.

If it should be thy will that we Should scale affliction's sterile steeps;
Bear sorrow and adversity,
With none to cheer the heart that weeps;
Still we our prayer would raise to thee
"Thou 'Man of Grief' our solace be."

Thou, who alone the winepress trod,
Who uttered the forsaken cry,
Bore meekly persecution's rod
Without a murmur or a sigh;
Thou "Man of Sorrows" be our stay
While trav'ling life's perplexing way.

Lord, we are blind!—be thou our sight;
Lord, we are weak!—be thou our strength;
Oh, shed thy ever-radiant light
Upon our path until at length
We grasp the hands—life's wanderings o'er—
Of the "beloved ones gone before."

—Gower Shaw.

THE GENERAL SECRETARY

An Important Announcement

On behalf of the Executive Committee of the Five Years Meeting the attention of Friends throughout the Yearly Meetings is called to the opening of the office of the General Secretary at 525 South Catalina Avenue, Pasadena, California. This, following the opening of the office of the Executive Committee at Richmond, Indiana, twelve months ago, marks the first step toward the consummation of a plan which was first taken under advisement by the Five Years Meeting in the year 1907. At its session in 1912 the one hundred and fifty delegates representing the various Yearly Meetings by unanimous vote recommended "the establishment of Central Offices for the Five Years Meeting" and "the appointment of a General Secretary with such assistants as may be necessary for the work devolving upon him."

The duties of the General Secretary were defined by the Five Years Meeting in the following terms: "He shall have supervision under the Executive Committee of all the departments of the Five Years Meeting." Beyond this brief general statement and an equally brief recommendation that "for the present [he] shall also be assigned to the specific field of Church Extension work," the Five Years Meeting did not prescribe either the nature or the scope of his duties. But a Commission report which constituted the basis for the discussion of the proposed measure in the Five Years Meeting and led to its final adoption suggested certain matters which, together with others that have claimed the attention of the Executive Committee and the Boards during the last twelve months, may serve to indicate with sufficient concreteness the purposes for which the Central Bureau with the General Secretary in charge was established. Prominent among these matters are the following: The demand for some adequate medium for the collection of facts and data for the use of the Boards of the Five Years Meeting, and the promotion of co-operation between those Boards and the corresponding Boards of the Yearly Meetings; the need for centralized, systematic measures for the promotion of denominational loyalty and support, financial and otherwise, among the rank and file of our membership; the pressing demand for the inauguration throughout the denomination of a uniform and better system of raising and apportioning church funds; the lack of full and accurate knowledge among the Yearly Meetings of their mutual interests, needs and work; the necessity that exists for the American Yearly Meetings to accustom themselves to co-operation with one another in such ways as to bring the collective strength of the whole denomination to bear upon the weaknesses and deficiencies of the Church at large; our need as Friends of a new and far broader vision than we now have of the place which we ought to occupy and the mission which is ours to fulfill in the advancing ranks of the great organized Christian forces of the twentieth century. The fact that in addition to his manifold general duties the field of Church Extension was for the present specifically assigned to the General Secretary indicates the supreme emphasis that the Five Years Meeting rightly places upon the work of aggressive evangelism.

Some of the practical means suggested in the Commission report above referred to for meeting the foregoing and other important needs of the Church were as follows: That the office of the General Secretary should become the depository of all kinds of information and statistics relative to the past and current work of Friends in America and elsewhere; that it should keep on file the proceedings of all Boards of the Five Years Meeting and detailed records of the work of the various Yearly Meetings; that the General Secretary should keep in touch with advanced lines and methods of work both within and without our denomination and that he should disseminate the information thus gained for the stimulation and strengthening of the different departments of our church work; that he should seek, in such ways as might be found possible, to render practical assistance to the standing committees of Yearly, Quarterly and Monthly Meetings, Young People's Societies, Men's Leagues, Boys' and Girls' Clubs and other working organizations within the Church; that the Central Bureau under his charge should become a medium of communication between needy fields and available workers in every department; that so far as practicable he should keep on file the names and addresses of Friends in all the Yearly Meetings who are available for pastoral, evangelistic or missionary labor, or for important positions in colleges, seminaries and academies, together with reliable information concerning their qualifications for such services. He should be in a position, also, to give information in regard to where well-equipped speakers in any department of work might be secured for meetings, conferences and special occasions; as time and circumstances permit, he might, to a limited extent, go through the Yearly Meetings, holding conferences,

DEVOTED TO THE INTERESTS OF QUAKERISM IN AMERICA

Volume Number Two

With this issue, we begin writing the history of another volume of THE AMERICAN FRIEND. What the record will be, it is not given us at this time to see. We can only plan and live in anticipation. For the most part it will be what Friends in America choose to make it.

The time is opportune to say some things that need to be said and considered. It is quite apparent that only in a limited degree does the great body of our Society realize in any vital sense that THE AMERICAN FRIEND is the creature as well as the servant of the whole Church. Perhaps by force of habit, four out of every five families of Friends in this country apparently regard the periodical as the property of some outside party, and feel no obligation to give it their patronage. Were the departments of foreign missions, evangelism and church extension, bible school and education regarded with the same indifference, the final chapter in our denominational history would be written in a few more years.

It is our purpose to make Friends everywhere see their responsibility to THE AMERICAN FRIEND, if it is possible to achieve it, for it is only by a decided increase in patronage that the paper can be of the largest practical service in ministering to the Church in all its departments. If Friends will only grasp the idea, their periodical can easily be made the biggest asset which the denomination has in this country. No other agency can serve it so universally and with such uniform regularity.

We have the impression that Friends quite generally have not yet adjusted themselves to the changed relationships which were created when the Five Years Meeting decided to issue a weekly publication under its direct management. We are informed that many members are still in a waiting attitude, watching to see what the policy is to be in the final analysis, anxious about what school of religious thought is to dominate its messages. Yet it would be just as sane for a large number of our members suddenly to withdraw their membership from the Church until they could be certain that their own particular beliefs are dominant, as for an equally large number to withhold their patronage from its periodical until its policy is better understood. The management of the paper is now directly responsible to the Five Years Meeting through a Board of Publication, and there ought to be no more suspicion of the paper than there is of the Church itself.

Apparently there is a tendency just now for some of our eastern Friends to discontinue their patronage. If western Friends will not support a paper published in the east and eastern Friends lose interest when the paper is taken west, it requires no gift of prophecy to read the ultimate destiny of a body that allows sectionalism to destroy its unity and solidarity. The time has come in our history, when sectionalism should be put under our feet, and when unity and fraternity should mark every step of our progress. We must go forward, if at all, as one body, conscious of a universal mission. It is not necessary that our methods of operation be identical in order that our unity be established. Our interests may be varied, due to local environment, but this should not affect the solidarity of our purposes, of our faith and of our mission.

As Friends we cannot thrive upon sectionalism or provincialism, no more than upon suspicion and disunion. We apparently need a baptism of charity as well as a vision of our denominational unity.

THE AMERICAN FRIEND is not the mouthpiece of any section, any faction, of any ism. During the present year, our best hopes will have been realized, if in any appreciable degree the periodical can be instrumental in helping to build up and strengthen the Church as a whole, so that it may be the better prepared for the mighty tasks to which God is calling it.

We do not minimize the splendid work being done by Friends in many communities, when we say that the field of opportunity is open wider than ever before. It is our concern that the Church go forward, and that in common with other denominations, we seek earnestly to adjust our operations to the conditions of the present age. This in part will be the burden of the message of THE AMERICAN FRIEND during this year, and Friends who are not its readers will sustain a loss which they can ill afford.

The Message of the New Year

It was a New Year's wish of William Romaine, of the eighteenth century, that the year might be a famous one for believing. In the same spirit it is our earnest wish that the present year may be to American Friends a year of mighty faith. Faith knows no discouragement, is not balked by environment, takes no account of the tempest, sees the safe harbor within the shore line.

In the presence of a mighty faith, doubts vanish, factions disappear, suspicion is dissolved, isms lose their identity, extremes are merged into a common melting pot, and a universal vision reveals a common goal beyond the sky line. Faith means fellowship, unity, solidarity; it means yoke service, team work, brotherhood. Faith will solve every problem of a discouraged congregation or Bible School, of every Board or Committee, of every individual who is concerned to be about his Master's business.

It were useless to deny that there are serious unsolved problems confronting American Quakerism of this generation. Without discrediting the splendid work that is being done, one cannot avoid the conviction that denominationally we are not keeping abreast of our opportunities. Too small a proportion of our membership is conscious of the responsibility which membership in the Church imposes. Too few are contributing in any adequate way to the support of the activities of the Church. Too many are apparently satisfied with the commonplace, content if they are merely holding their own.

In hundreds of communities, families are living in sight of the meeting house, which are never touched in any adequate way by the spiritual life of the meeting, largely for lack of some organized, determined effort on the part of the meeting to reach them. In many neighborhoods there is an apparent willingness to be satisfied with the number who choose voluntarily to come to the meeting and the Bible School, with no organized effort put forth to make the community feel that every family is wanted at the place of worship.

The great work of home as well as foreign missions, the work of evangelism, of social service, of temperance, of peace, should have a larger place in our denominational life. The world all about us needs the inspiration and the mighty pull of the kind of Christian life and experience which the Quaker name typifies. The Christian Church is moving forward as it has not done since the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, impelled by the consciousness of a mighty call to a higher life and a higher service in the task of world evangelization. Friends should be in the very forefront of this march of conquest upon the infidelity and carelessness and sin of the world.

We need a faith that will take us out of the environment of custom and tradition, and set our feet upon the highway whereon are being worked out the problems of world redemption. But an ancient writer declared that "faith without works is dead." To show forth the Christian ideal of the holy life, is to manifest the ideals of good works, whereby Jesus Christ is revealed in life and by example to needy humanity.

Why may not this year also be known as a year of intercession, wherein our membership, conscious of the Divine favor, and impelled by an unconquerable faith, is led into close and constant communion with the Father, seeking Divine blessing and Divine guidance upon all our activities? May it not be a year in which God is given the right of way individually and collectively in all our plans and in all our procedure? By prayer and by supplication, let us make known our wants unto the Lord, and let us be diligent to follow His leading to the end.

With renewed consecration, and with a spirit of determination no less than of devotion, let us face the tasks of this wonderful year, which can easily mark an epoch of unusual advancement for Quakerism in America.

That Meeting of Men

The interest which a number of Friends are beginning to manifest in that suggested meeting of men Friends to talk over some of our pressing denominational problems is encouraging. Several have endorsed the idea, two have written opposing it, while one is willing to be convinced.

We are convinced that this is one of the best ways to get at the heart of some of our problems, which the Church in its formal capacity is prone to ignore. The spirit of Quakerism is in danger of being covered up by tradition. The first message of Friends was a message to all men, and thousands flocked to the Quaker standard during the first century of our existence. Now we are too prone to regard the message as one for ourselves alone, and we are loth to break through the shell of our environment and find a wider field for our life, our message and our activities in the needy world outside.

The Christian Church is hearing the call of the world as it has not done since the great commission was given to the Church by Jesus himself, and Friends cannot afford to allow a spirit of exclusiveness to shut us out from having our full share in the world-wide evangelism that is now being applied so vigorously for individual and community and municipal and social and world redemption.

What the Edinburg Conference was to Missions, what the Indianapolis Conference was to Methodism, what the Columbus Convention was to prohibition, a gathering of Quaker men, filled with the spirit of earnest determination, may be to our denomination.

A Recent Visit to Madagascar

BY HENRY T. HODGKIN

Last summer the little field of Madagascar was the scene of an investigation which is probably unique in the annals of missionary history. For some years past several of the missionary societies working in Madagascar have had it in mind to send out a deputation. Being in close consultation at the home end, it was possible to arrange for a joint deputation on the part of three of these societies. The London Missionary Society, the Paris Missionary Society, and the Friends' Foreign Missionary Association each sent out three delegates, including in each case the Secretary, who had special responsibilities in the Madagascar field. More than a year ago a carefully prepared list of questions was sent out to missionaries in Madagascar. These questions covered the whole range of missionary activity in Madagascar, being classified under such topics as "General Survey," "The Malagasy Church and Workers," "Educational Work," "The relation of the Missions to one another and to the problem of unity," etc. Answers to these questions, extending to over 150 typewritten pages, were received prior to the departure of the deputations. These answers, having been classified and arranged, were studied by the members of the deputations on their way out to Madagascar, and thus they arrived with a very fair knowledge of the views of the missionary societies in regard to the most pressing problems, and they also had a thorough, up-to-date knowledge of the facts of the situation.

There are four other Protestant Missionary Societies working in Madagascar, and, although these Societies were not able to send deputations from home, they in each case appointed a representative on the field to co-operate with the members of the three deputations. It was thus possible in joint conference to reach conclusions in which all the Missionary Societies participated through their duly accredited representatives.

The work in Madagascar centers in Tananarive, the capital of the island, to a larger extent, perhaps, than is true of most mission fields. After spending a few days together in Tananarive, the members of the Deputation took extended journeys into the country districts, each visiting thoroughly the stations connected with his own Society, and also one or two stations of other societies. On returning to the Capital, the Deputations met with their own missionaries in order to discuss the various problems facing each Mission. These gatherings were followed by joint conferences (a) between the Deputations; (b) between the Deputations and certain selected missionaries; (c) between the Deputations and all the missionaries; and (d) between the Deputations and Malagasy leaders. This series of conferences was carefully planned and resulted in the laying down of certain general lines of policy and the agreement on one or two specific steps. Each Society stated what its desire was in regard to the occupation of further territory, and, by the end of the conferences, a general agreement had been arrived at as to the territory which each Society should consider as allotted to it for its extension work. Almost the whole of the Island has thus been parceled out between the various Missionary Societies, a definite section being also allocated to the Native Missionary Society, which has, for many years past, been doing an extended evangelistic work. As a result of conference with this Society, its work was narrowed down to a smaller area, in which it is hoped that it will be able to do a more thorough and permanent piece of work. An official map of the Island has thus been prepared jointly by the various Deputations, and this map will be used for reference in any cases of difficulty which may arise, being, of course, regarded as subject to modification, after joint discussion, if found necessary.

A long discussion at the conference on the moral and spiritual condition of the Church resulted in general agreement on a resolution as to the conditions for entrance into the Church, and a statement was made to a representative group of Malagasy leaders setting forth the views of the conference on this most important question.

A good deal of time was given to the discussion of educational questions, and it was agreed to establish an Educational Board, for all the Missions in Madagascar, at which questions of educational policy could be freely discussed. There can be no doubt that the establishment of this Board will serve a very useful purpose in improving the standards of educational work and bringing the Missions into closer relations with the Malagasy teachers, and, perhaps, with the French Government.

The final act of the conference was the establishment of a Continuation Committee, on which each of the Missions should have equal representation, and whose duties were to be advisory and consultative.

The three societies sending out deputations from home are even more closely in touch with one another than they are with the other four societies. The churches established in connection with these societies have drawn closely together, and a federation of the churches has for some time been in existence. Through the visit of the deputation, considerable progress was made in the drafting of a constitution for this federation, the most notable provision of which is for the free interchange of members between one church and another on the receipt of a letter of recommendation from the church in which the individual has his membership. This step involves the receiving, on the part of the churches connected with the L. M. S. and the P. M. S., of members of the Society of Friends who have not undergone the rite of water baptism, and do not partake outwardly of the Lord's Supper. The church connected with the Friends' Foreign Mission

Association will, on its part, accept the members of the other churches, and make adequate provision for their participation in these rites. The basis of the whole federation is a complete recognition of our actual unity in Christ, even in spite of considerable differences in forms and practices.

The closing days of the Deputation were largely devoted to immense meetings of the Malagasy who had gathered from all parts of the country for the regular Six Monthly meetings of the Malagasy Church. All the churches in the Capital were crowded, and many thousands listened to the various addresses which were given. These meetings were not only a great demonstration of the power of Christianity in Madagascar, but were also a means of bringing the Malagasy generally into touch with the visitors from Europe, and enabling the latter to deliver messages from the Home Churches to the people of Madagascar. It is hardly possible to overstate the deep impression which was made upon the Malagasy by the fact of this practical demonstration of unity, amongst the various Missions, such as had never been seen in the history of Malagasy Christianity. No doubt a great impetus has also been given to the movement towards self-government and self-support. The various churches in Madagascar are making steady progress in this direction, and already one seems to see on the horizon the day when the foreigner shall be able to withdraw from Madagascar, or at any rate from the Central Plain, where missionary work has been progressing now for almost one hundred years.

To those who took part in the Deputation, the method adopted of sending out the three Deputations at the same time, and of co-operating with all the other Missions in the field through their accredited representatives, has amply justified itself, and it is hoped that the experiment may be followed in the case of other fields.

It is only possible, in this short article, to give a very brief account of what was actually accomplished; but enough will, perhaps, have been said to show the advantages which may come from such an investigation of a particular mission field. To many it seemed as if the work of the Church of Christ in Madagascar had entered upon a new era as a result of this visit.

The Reform Jews in America

BY JOSEPH ELKINTON

Within the past month an unusual opportunity was presented to the writer, to meet the Jews of Western Pennsylvania, by an invitation to address the congregation of Dr. J. Leonard Levy in Pittsburgh. It may be said that Dr. Levy is one of the greatest peace leaders in Pittsburgh.

Dr. Levy spent eight years in Philadelphia before he went to Pittsburgh. His humanitarian work in behalf of the street Arab in the neighborhood of my father's city home brought the Rabbi into close touch with the family and a mutual respect resulted. In his farewell address to his Philadelphia congregation, Keneseth Israel, he said: "By a strange coincidence it was fourteen years ago yesterday that I happened to deliver an address in London on the Scripture lesson of the week, the opening chapters of the Book of Leviticus. These chapters deal with the sacrificial system, and I remarked that 'If God were to re-dictate the Scriptures he would not ask men to bring sacrifices of bulls and rams and flour and oil, but He would ask them to sacrifice their base desires, in His name, and to overcome their sinful propensities.' This statement was made in 1887 when I devoutly held the views of the Orthodox party in Judaism and when I believed that God had written or dictated every word of the Pentateuch. It seemed a radical statement to a very orthodox member of my congregation. He took exception to my words and informed the authorities in London that I had been smitten with the plague of leprosy—such being the name given to Reform among the Orthodox, at least in England. The authorities requested that I should go into my pulpit and retract this unorthodox (?) statement. I was accustomed in those days, as were most English preachers, to write my sermons and I submitted the offending words for consideration. At the same time I asked that a reply should be sent to me, requesting also the right to publish it. To this day I have received no reply, probably because the words I used, while radical in significance, are, like all true radicalism, perfectly orthodox. They are strictly in harmony with Bible teaching and are a truism today. * * * The cry that goes up today for social justice and regeneration is the old appeal of the Prophets. The demand for economic equity is the same as that made by these leaders of Israel. The conditions that evoked the divine indignation and inspired genius of a Moses, that aroused the ardent enthusiasm of an Elijah, that awakened the impassioned outpourings of an Amos, that placed the live coal of prophecy on the lips of an Isaiah, that led Jeremiah and Ezekiel, Micah and Malachi, and all the worthies of the house of Israel, to strike the trembling strings of prophecy with the immortal genius of the inspired—these conditions still evoke words of reprehension from men who are the prophets of modern times, but whose teachers, inspirers and guides were and still are the prophets of Israel.

"They are the world's masters and they deserve their mastery through their genius for spirituality and faith in the invisible realities."

I have quoted somewhat at length from the Rabbi's words as he told a group of 1200 Jews in his temple on the 16th ultimo, what the Reform Jews of America believe, and he insisted that he would not respect any of his congregation who would forego any of the ritualistic requirements of their faith because it was more convenient to do so, but only because they were fully persuaded that the spirit of those obligations was better promoted by adapting their lives to the best service they could render their fellow men under the existing conditions which surround them. The enlightened progressive wisdom of Rabbi Levy made a deep impression upon all present and I was very thankful that Pittsburgh had such a public-spirited leader in humanitarian and civic righteousness.

The 500 little children gathered in their Sunday School were exceedingly attractive in appearance and they gave most polite attention to the address made to them.

When the Doctor was introducing me he said: "This is my dear friend and Christian brother whom I would not change although he belongs to another religion." He also invited several of his friends to meet me socially at his home. It was there that I met a Jewess of middle life who was about to take nurses out to Jerusalem for the third time. These minister to the poor children of that city, and the doctor had held several meetings to interest others in her humane efforts. He had also recently held a public meeting, which was attended by 5,000, to protest against the effort of the Russian Government to condemn an innocent Jewish subject of murder.

The work of Rabbi Levy in bringing his co-religionists to a larger conception of truth and its practical application to modern day problems is one which compares favorably with that of any preacher of America. His fatherly care over the youth of his congregation was much in evidence and one could but see in how many ways the care he took to educate them corresponded to the concern Friends have long felt to educate their children.

All Protestant Churches Acting Together

This season is witnessing an unusual illustration of the fundamental unity among Protestant Christians of all denominations. The leaders of nearly fifty of these denominations, including all of the larger ones, have entered upon a combined effort to enlist millions more of the rank and file of church members to do something to propagate the Christian religion, in addition to going to church themselves and helping to pay the local church expenses. The campaign is to head up next March in a simultaneous nation-wide canvass for all missions and benevolences on the part of all churches of all denominations. The men who have been studying the returns say that only about one-third of Protestant church members have yet begun to give anything to plant new churches in the needy places in America and among the non-Christian nations of the world. The organized personal canvass is the method proving most successful in getting many thousands of these people to be regular subscribers and givers.

The promoters of this effort, which goes under the name of the "United Missionary Campaign," point out the fact that scarcely one-half of the adult population of America are members of any church. Included in this unchurched population are multitudes of foreign-speaking people, speaking scores of different languages. There is therefore plenty of room for aggressive Home Missionary work on the part of all the churches.

It is also a time of unusual opportunity to propagate

Christianity among non-Christian nations. The foreign missionary work carried on for the past hundred years has been one of the principal causes of the great changes taking place in Turkey, Persia, India, Japan, China and other countries. This work has grown until it is a tremendous world-wide business, in which over 24,000 men and women missionaries are engaged and for which the Protestant churches of Christendom contribute over 30 million dollars annually. Of this total, fully one-half comes from the United States.

A native church of nearly three millions of communicant members has been built up, with four millions more of adherents. About six thousand of these natives have been prepared by long courses of training for the Christian ministry and are now ordained pastors of their own people. But from every field there are calls for great advances. The missionaries abroad believe that their total force should probably be doubled in order to meet worthily the present opportunity. Nearly 200,000 persons per year are now being received into church membership from these fields, but this number could probably be doubled if there were workers enough.

In view of these great needs the Home and Foreign Missionary leaders of the United States and Canada are engaging this year in a great combined effort to interest and enlist all churches more generally and more fully in this missionary business. They have requested and secured the Laymen's Missionary Movement to take general charge of the organization of the field campaign. The Missionary Education Movement has prepared an exhibit of literature which will be used at all the conferences. The plan is to hold interdenominational conferences, lasting two days each, in as many cities and towns as possible. Already many teams of speakers have been organized for the United States alone, in addition to several teams in Canada. Some of these teams will conduct as many as forty different conferences. Several teams have already held conferences.

The total number of conferences held will reach well over five hundred. All of them are for the one purpose of informing church people of the crying need of a great advance in mission work both at home and abroad, together with an exploitation of those methods that have proved most effective in enabling churches and whole cities and denominations to multiply their missionary output. It is also found that the churches that do most for others are the best off themselves. The churches that are self-centered are apt to decline. It seems to be a normal and necessary fact that "the light that shines farthest, shines brightest nearest home."

The ninth annual report of the Superintendent of the department of Peace and International Arbitration of the World's W. C. T. U., by Hannah J. Bailey, a well known Friend of Maine, is a most encouraging document, summing up as it does the up-to-date efforts for peace throughout the world.

giving lectures, circulating literature and presenting advanced methods of work along various lines; he should issue annually a handbook or bulletin showing briefly and clearly the work in which the Boards of the Five Years Meeting and the Central Bureau have been engaged during the year and the special lines of work in which they are prepared to offer assistance the following year.

Friends will readily understand that not all of the work outlined above can be undertaken at once, and that as time goes by other equally important demands upon the Bureau may be expected to arise. The real character and range of the work must be a growth from year to year.

The disadvantages involved in the location of this office upon the Pacific Coast are obvious, and to nobody more so than to the General Secretary himself, who, as a member of the Executive Committee, earnestly favored a central location and a different management from the present. However, the total inconvenience to all concerned, as regards the time and distance required for the transmission of correspondence and for such travel as may devolve upon the Secretary, is considerably reduced by the fact that approximately forty per cent of the membership of the Five Years Meeting is west of the Mississippi river. In this connection it is worthy of note that some other denominations, a very considerable proportion of whose membership is west of the Rocky mountains, maintain their general offices at the Atlantic sea-board. Moreover, the location of the Friends Bureau so far from the geographic center of the denomination and the term of service of the present General Secretary are for the year 1914 only. In the judgment of the Executive Committee the present arrangement is the most feasible one that could have been made, all things considered, for the coming year. It was their thought that under it a measure of progress will be possible during the next twelve months in the organization and development of the work which will serve as the basis for its prosecution under more favorable conditions in future years.

For the accomplishment of that end this new department of our denominational work invites the hearty co-operation of all Boards and delegations of the Five Years Meeting; members of Yearly, Quarterly and Monthly Meetings Committees; leaders in educational and philanthropic work; pastors and workers of every rank and station. Inquiries, suggestions and helpful information will be welcomed at all times from any one in the Quaker ranks who is alive to the obligation that rests upon us today, as Friends, to prove ourselves a worthy part of the present-day Church of Jesus Christ.

JOSEPH JOHN MILLS,
General Secretary.

Pasadena, California.

Dr. G. Campbell Morgan and Evangelist Gypsy Smith will come to America this month and will hold evangelistic services in fifteen western cities.

In the World of Action

The Maryland Anti-Saloon League has determined to make a fight for state-wide prohibition, and will ask the approaching Legislature for a state-wide vote on the question.

Friday, January 9th, has been set apart as a day of united prayer for the Federation of Woman's Boards of Foreign Missions in the United States. The general subject is a desire that women may accomplish their part in world evangelization. It is asked that prayer be offered for unity, for all Woman's Boards of Missions, for a vision of the task, for the missionaries, for guidance and wisdom, and for mission fields.

The American Institute of Sacred Literature, located at the University of Chicago, is promoting two new courses of unusual interest. One is an outline study course, using the Bible alone as a text, entitled "The Origin and Teaching of the New Testament Books." The second course is on the "Expansion of Christianity in the Twentieth Century," an extensive reading course comprising some twenty-three standard books upon the present states of Christian Missions in China, India, Japan and the countries where Mohammedanism prevails. Anyone interested can address "The American Institute of Sacred Literature, University of Chicago, Chicago, Illinois."

Henry King Carroll, LL. D., has been chosen by the Executive Committee of the Federal Council of Churches, as Associate Secretary, and is to be located with an office of the Council in Washington City. He brings to the new office large experience. For many years he was on the editorial staff of the New York Independent. In 1890 he was the special agent of the Government for the census of religious bodies. President McKinley sent him as a special Commissioner to Porto Rico to investigate conditions and formulate a system of Civil Government for the Island. He has widely contributed to literature on the religious forces in the United States. He will be a valuable man to represent the federated Churches of the country at our National Capital.

At its meeting on December 3-5, at Baltimore, the Executive Committee of the Federal Council of Churches adopted the following resolution, the statement being made that the situation with which it deals is still very critical:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Council be instructed to continue the securing of memorials from constituent bodies and local conferences, and the forwarding of them to the Mayor of San Francisco and Panama Exposition authorities, urging the necessity for maintaining the high moral tone which we are assured by these officials is being sought by them by constant and watchful action to prevent the misuse of the occasion by commercialized iniquity."

Next Week

In the issue of THE AMERICAN FRIEND next week, among many other good things, we will have an article by Rufus M. Jones on "The Duty of the Church to the Community," and a sermon by H. E. McGrew, of Whittier, California.

CORRESPONDENCE

Asking and Receiving

I am much interested in Francis A. Wright's article, "The Impulse to Prayer," in THE AMERICAN FRIEND of November 20th. I would like to add that Christ says, "Every one that asketh receiveth"; "Ask and it shall be given" (Matt. 7: 7). The asking is without limitation; the promise of receiving is positive.

No one ever asked God for anything without receiving, but not always what is asked for. That which looks to us so essential gives no blessing, but is often a stone, a dead weight. And yet we receive far better than we ask for. The simplest desire that looks up to God for a filling is in itself a blessing, because it makes one conscious of His nearness. As Whittier said in conversation with a friend, "The final of all true prayer must be 'Thy will be done'." This in itself is the best of prayer.

I am sure we dishonor our Father by trying to carry our burdens alone, and quite as much by giving place to desires that we would blush to ask our Father for.

Friends who do not receive what many of our fellow Christians call communion, ought to commune. But what is it to commune? Is it not for kindred spirits to talk together with unveiled face, to speak without reserve, to confide the deepest longing of the soul?

Our Father reveals the richest of His treasures to those who confide in Him, who talk over with Him our least and most common things of every-day life. The little daily worries and accumulated burdens are like the little foxes that spoil the tender grapes, that scatter the thought that would bring food and refreshing when allowed to give a sense of the Divine presence. Yes, if we ask we receive; if not the thing we ask for, something very much better, as much better as a fish is better than a serpent, as an egg than a scorpion.

CHARLES W. GODDARD.

Antiquated

The word "Temperance" in connection with the use of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes was allowable fifty years ago and longer, but now it should be discarded, for the reason that it has been appropriated by the liquor people themselves. With Friends, therefore, the word in this sense should become obsolete, for as a rule we claim to be total abstainers, except perhaps in a few lingering cases "for medicine only," or for "thy stomach's sake."

We have become prohibitionists, in varying degrees. Some are content with "local option," just as the liquor men are in many places; others are for "county option," a little removed from the liquor men; while still others have advanced to "local option" by states. The next step is nation-wide prohibition by a prohibition amendment to the Federal Constitution.

It appears to the writer that since the great convention at Columbus, Ohio, in November, when men from all religious denominations, from Catholic to Quaker, and men from all political parties declared for nation-wide prohibition, Friends should leave "temperance" out of their liquor vocabulary. Ninety odd organizations, represented in the Columbus convention, united for a nation-wide prohibition, total abstinence pledge signing and anti-white slave traffic campaign. In no instance was "temperance" spoken of as a watch-word.

Denominational Temperance Works

The first meeting of the new Temperance Commission of the Federal Council of Churches in America was held at Washington City, December 11th. This Commission represents the organized and official temperance work of the various denominations. S. E. Nicholson, Sarah H. Hogue and V. D. Hinshaw were present from Friends. About thirty persons in all attended, representing thirteen denominations.

The Commission adopted a working plan and elected officers as follows: Chairman, Dr. Rufus W. Miller, Philadelphia; Vice-Chairman, Hon. Joshua Levering, Baltimore; Secretary, Prof. Charles Scanlon, Pittsburgh; Treasurer, John Walton, Philadelphia. An Executive Committee was named, consisting of the officers and seven additional members.

Various subjects, like literature, pledge signing and other phases of the work were brought before the Commission in the form of addresses by S. Z. Batten, Cora Frances Stoddard, Zillah Foster Stephens, Dr. Charles S. McFarland, S. E. Nicholson, Prof. Charles Scanlon, John W. Cummings and D. A. Poling. A Committee on Literature was named as follows: S. Z. Batten, S. E. Nicholson, Cora F. Stoddard, Dr. Homer J. Hall and S. E. Gill. Steps were taken to set in motion an aggressive and well planned campaign for denominational temperance work, and many matters were referred to the Executive Committee for action.

Who lays down the money and does it quite gladly,
And casts round the office a halo of cheer.

THE MADONNA OF THE EAST

I see no wondering Mary bending low,
No Babe in manger, Kings from far off lands,
Or shepherds from the field, or heavenly bands
Sweet singing; but where the day's gates open slow
The ancient mother of the East, aglow
In robes of oriental splendor, stands:
Albeit with sunken cheek and eye; and hands,
Thin hands that plead protection from the foe.

For this her new born babe. List to her cry—
"Oh West! Oh father of my babe, I die!
My glories fade, I know not what must be Save that I perish—Oh, befriend my child!"
Then comes another voice—"As to this child
Ye did, e'en so ye did it unto Me."

Baltimore, Maryland.

Current Items of Interest to Friends

CALIFORNIA YEARLY MEETING

Long Beach—For the past year and a half the Long Beach church has been sustained by voluntary offerings for its current expenses, and it has a large surplus in the treasury from which the church has received a fresh coat of paint.—Pacific Friend.

Bell—World's Temperance Sunday was appropriately observed as a result of which a pledge flag of one hundred names is being made to be displayed as an outward symbol that we have declared our freedom from all things unclean.

East Whittier—The Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Friends' church met on Friday afternoon, December 12th, at the home of Mrs. Nathan Heaton. Interesting letters were read from one of the missionaries in Alaska, and from the Spanish children's home in Whittier. The lesson readings for the day were given by Mrs. Compton and Mrs. Talbot Ware. Three comforters were knotted during the afternoon.—Pacific Friend.

Oakland—Levi Gregory, pastor of the meeting, and Mrs. Gregory, celebrated the fortieth anniversary of their wedding on December 10th. The work of the meeting is going forward with prospects of a greater future.

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING

Winchester—Sunday, December 21, was a red letter day for Winchester Friends on account of the presence of Arthur C. Chilson and wife, who are at home on a furlough for a much needed rest from the work of the Friends' Industrial Mission in British East Africa. On Friday afternoon an informal parlor meeting was held at the home of Mrs. Dr. Milligan, where Mrs. Chilson entertained the ladies of the Missionary Society for two hours, giving most interesting accounts of the work at the mission. On Sunday morning at the close of the Bible School four hundred and thirty-five people listened with rapt attention, while Mr. and Mrs. Chilson each gave talks on the habits and customs of the people. At the church services following, they both spoke again to a large and interested congregation. In the afternoon Mrs. Chilson held a meeting for the children, and a great many came to hear her tell again in her pleasing way, stories of her seven years' stay in Africa. In the evening the Chilsons spoke at Jericho.

IOWA YEARLY MEETING

Minneapolis, Minn.—At the Friends' Meeting, "The True Helpmate of Righteous—War or Peace?" was the subject presented on Sunday, December 21, by the pastor, Samuel L. Haworth.

KANSAS YEARLY MEETING

Cherokee, Okla.—The Friends Church of Cherokee, Oklahoma, in Stella Quarterly Meeting, began a series of revival meetings November 10th, lasting three weeks, conducted by Charles Lescault, a former pastor of the church for four years, and now pastor of the Friends' Church at Haviland, Kansas. His sermons carried conviction to the heart of the sinner, and many were brought to the Savior in the forgiveness of their sins. The members of the church were greatly strengthened in their faith in God. The entire town has known Brother Lescault only to love and respect him, and manifested this love and appreciation by filling the house to overflowing every night of the meeting. A number united with the church as a direct result of this meeting, and under the able leadership of John C. Griffin, pastor of the church, we feel that there is a very bright future ahead for the Friends Church in Cherokee.

Lawrence—Hesper Quarterly Meeting was held at Lawrence, December 12-14, with representatives from five of the Monthly Meetings present. All of the pastors were present except one, who was engaged in a series of meetings. Revivals have been held in two of the Monthly Meetings, Prairie Center and Spring Grove, with good results. We had the acceptable company of Asa Dillon, a young minister from North Branch, with a minute to visit local meetings. Arthur Jones, pastor at Kansas City, preached a good sermon on Saturday morning. An interesting missionary program was rendered on Saturday night. On Sunday morning at 9:30, a Bible School Conference was conducted by Dr. Watson, of Hesper, bringing out many interesting points in intervening chapters on the "Life of Moses." At 11:00 o'clock, John D. Mills, pastor at Hesper, brought us a powerful message. Sunday afternoon, the Christian Endeavor held an interesting conference. A social hour with dinner was enjoyed by all on Saturday before the business session of the Quarterly Meeting at 1:30.

Stafford—Olen Hunt, of Alba, Mo.,

closed a successful meeting at Stafford on the 17th of December. Twenty-five sessions were held in twelve days. Seventy were definitely blessed and about twenty-five requests for membership have been presented, with more to follow. Eight went to five other churches. Brother Hunt was surely sent this way by the Lord at the right time. He preached with the spirit and power, and many more were under deep conviction. Good order and a deep interest were manifested all through the meetings. Visiting workers were Burt Woodward, our Quarterly Meeting Superintendent of Haviland; Oliver Ballard of Prairie Flower Meeting, and Edgar Potter, of Antioch. A. W. Whipple, the pastor, has almost lost the sight of an eye from a recent injury.

NEW ENGLAND YEARLY MEETING

Allens Neck, Mass.—The members and attenders of Allens Neck Meeting, Massachusetts, have laid the foundation for the building of an addition to their Meeting House, 28 by 34 feet, to be divided into a room for a library, a kitchen, and a hall for the use of the growing Bible School, Christian Endeavor and other departments of the meeting. To meet the anticipated expense, $1,100 has been subscribed. The movement was started a few years ago, but received new fire from the enthusiastic efforts of Ora W. and Golda R. Carroll during their stay with us for their summer vacation. Their varied service was very efficient and helpful, both in the ministry and socially.

NORTH CAROLINA YEARLY MEETING

Greensboro—Lewis W. McFarland, pastor at High Point, preached at Greensboro the evening of the 14th. Earl J. Harold, Secretary of the city Inter-Church Association, is winning for himself a large place in the hearts of the people of Greensboro, because of his efficient service. The Christian Endeavor at Greensboro decided to purchase a typewriter for Arthur and Edna Chilson, for their work in Africa.

OHIO YEARLY MEETING

Christian Endeavor—The Christian Endeavor Societies of the Yearly Meeting have adopted the plan of spending a few minutes at each business meeting and social in reading the book, "Aliens and Americans."

OREGON YEARLY MEETING

Rosedale—A two weeks' revival was held by Myra B. Smith at Rosedale, a small country meeting seven miles south of Salem, beginning November 16th. The meetings were well advertised beforehand by the pastor, Chester A. Hadley, but an almost continual downpour of rain kept the congregations very small. However, the minister and Christians prayed much and waited on God. Myra Smith preached the Word with power and unction of the Spirit. Conviction seemed to settle on the neighborhood, one woman being so convicted for sin, in her own home, that she became ill, and sent for the pastor and his wife to come and pray for her, which they did and she was blessedly saved. Between twenty-five and thirty received pardon for sin during the meeting. A few remarkable cases showed the mighty power of God, to whom be all the glory.

Newberg—The meeting at this place has been richly blessed of God in a series of meetings led by Lindley A. Wells, of Portland, working side by side with the pastor, Charles O. Whitely, who shared in every burden. The meetings continued for over three weeks, with from one to three sessions per day. Over a hundred confessed definite blessing, in conversion, renewal or the baptism of the Spirit. The preaching was loving but uncompromising. Loyalty to the truth was accompanied constantly by loyalty to the Friends' Church, and the work of the evangelist, who has been a pastor for over a score of years, was done in a way to aid the work of the pastor after the meetings, rather than to make it more difficult. While but few special sessions were held in the college, the college community was reached in a very thorough way. No part of the church was more faithful to the meetings, and numbers of the college people were blessed, while many more helped in bringing blessings to others. About twenty will be added to the local meeting as a result of the series. The work is not ended yet, as the Sabbath meeting following the close of the special effort saw the work of evangelism still moving. Prayer meetings are having to be held in the main auditorium, as they have outgrown the smaller room. The work of the church is advancing in all departments, and a new Junior and Intermediate Christian Endeavor Society has just been organized to carry on still further the work with the children.—L. T. P.

Pacific College—The boarding hall is crowded to its capacity, and if another year shows a like increase, it will be necessary to make other provisions for dormitory facilities. The work of improving the buildings and grounds is being carried on as rapidly as the funds available will permit. Extensive improvements have been made in the dormitory, including a new furnace, repapering of all the halls, etc. Preparations are already in progress for the State Prohibition Oratorical contest to be held at the college this year. A good sized class is taking a course in practical homiletics under President Pennington. The Christian Associations are doing commendable work in Bible study, mission study, deputation work, etc.

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING

Moorestown—Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting was held on December 11th. Few seats were vacant upon the main floor. In the business meeting reports were given of the work of the Committee on Visitation and of the Atlantic City and Merchantville Committees.

Friends' Institute—The Board of Managers of Friends' Institute has recently issued its thirty-third annual report. More than 12,000 persons used the rooms during the year. The value of the Institute located on South Twelfth Street, as a center of Friendly interests, is widely acknowledged.

WESTERN YEARLY MEETING

Lapel—We have just closed a very successful revival meeting here. The Lord gave us a glorious time in straightening things up. Our new pastor, Charles W. Peltz, and his sister, Jessie Snow, were the workers. There were thirty-one definitely saved and four sanctified, with seven additions to the church. We are expecting a good year with the Lord.—Evan. Friend.

WILMINGTON YEARLY MEETING

Ogden—Bertha E. Day, an evangelist of Rockford, Ohio, assisted by Mildred B. Allen as personal worker, closed a twelve days' meeting at Ogden, December 21st, resulting in thirty-three conversions. What seemed to be remarkable was that a large number of these were men. The meeting was well attended from beginning to end. At times it was impossible to secure seats for all. Men and women would stand for two hours and seem to enjoy the service. More than two-thirds of the audience each evening were men. Orvil Bevin, Superintendent of S. S., was a great help in the meeting.

FRIENDS WANTED AT CASHMERE, WASHINGTON

Friends wishing to locate in the West, especially for the purpose of raising fruit, will do well to write to Leslie G. Sickles, Cashmere, Washington, R. D. 1, Box 78. I am not a real estate agent, nor have I any land to sell, but will help to locate anyone, so as to build up a Friends work in the Cashmere valley. We have a Sabbath School organized and have morning service, but we still need the help of several solid families to cope with the environments around us. It is all fruit raising in this valley and everyone seems to prosper.

THE GENERAL SECRETARYSHIP

By direction of the Executive Committee, the following letter, which is self explanatory, has been prepared, and is being sent out to a number of Friends. All who read this and who may not have received copy of the letter, are invited to send a contribution or subscription as directed below.

Richmond, Indiana, Dec. 10, 1913.

Dear Friend—The last Five Years Meeting directed that a General Secretary be chosen to increase the efficiency of the work of Friends. Dr. Joseph John Mills has been selected by the Executive Committee to fill this important position, while the Chairman of the Committee will take care of certain correspondence belonging to the office.

The Five Years Meeting was very clear in its judgment that the employment of a General Secretary was the next step demanded in the program of organization which it adopted, and those Friends who were present pledged $1,000.00 a year for five years toward the $2,500.00 a year which will be needed to finance the office. This amount has been increased slightly since that time.

To carry out the plan $1,200.00 a year for the next four years must be secured. We write to ask thy aid in this enterprise. Dr. Mills has the confidence of Friends throughout America, and his services to the denomination as a whole, and to the several Boards will be invaluable.

We cannot doubt that every loyal Friend will want to have a part in forwarding the work of the church through this channel. Will thee help liberally to support the central office, which in turn will help all our membership and meetings to do more efficient work? The need of such support is imperative. Please fill up the enclosed blank and send to the Treasurer, Francis A. Wright, Jr., 520 American Bank Building, Kansas City, Missouri.

Please do it at once.

On behalf of the Executive Committee.

MILES WHITE, JR.

BOOKS RECEIVED

A Wayfarer's Faith, by T. Edmund Harvey, of London. Published by Wells Gardner, Darton & Co., Ltd., 3 and 4 Paternoster Buildings, E. C., and 44 Victoria St., London. Sold by Friends' Book and Tract Committee, 144 East 20th St., New York City. 156 pages. Cloth. Postage prepaid, 60 cents.

This is an exposition of various aspects of the common basis of religious life. The author lays stress everywhere on the things that make for unity, peace and concord. Attention is constantly drawn to what is permanent in the religious life. One of the pleasantest chapters is "The House of Peace." An appeal is made in the concluding chapters for a fresh development of the religious spirit.

Iscariot's Bitter Love. Published by Headley Brothers, Bishopsgate, London, E. C., England. 88 pages. In paper, one shilling net.

This is an anonymous dramatic poem, devoted largely to the supposedly conflicting emotions of Judas, but in part to dialogues carried on while the great drama of the last days of Christ before the crucifixion is being enacted behind the scenes, giving a well conceived presentation of the effect upon the minds of a Galilean, a Jew, certain Greeks, a Wise Man from the East and others. The author is both a poet and a seer, and whether his views are accepted or not, he has presented a poem well worth reading.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE NOTES

At the meeting of the Executive Committee of the Five Years Meeting on October 22-23, it was announced that Walter H. Wood had been chosen to succeed Robert E. Pretlow on the Evangelistic Board from New York Yearly Meeting, and that Ernest L. Gregory, of Iowa, had been named to succeed Zeno Doan on the Jamaica Field Committee of the Board on Foreign Missions.

Robert L. Kelly, Chairman of the Educational Board, reported that many Friends are now attending Hartford Theological Seminary, and that a request has come that we make that institution a special place for training Friends. The Educational Board was instructed to correspond with the Seminary authorities on the subject, and report to the next meeting.

The Legislative Board was requested to collect information regarding marriage laws in the several states, and to take steps to get laws changed in states where the rights of marriage according to the usages of Friends are not properly safeguarded.

The question of preparing a booklet giving accurate and concrete information about the work of the various Boards of the Five Years Meeting, for use in the United Mission Campaign, was referred to the General Secretary. Allen D. Hole and S. E. Nicholson were appointed a Committee to co-operate with each Board that participates in this Campaign. Allen D. Hole, Charles E. Tebbetts and Joseph John Mills were appointed to issue a call to the whole Church to enter into this Mission Campaign.

BIBLE SCHOOL LESSON

January 11.

Subject—The Mission of the Seventy.

Lesson—Luke 10: 1-24.

Golden Text—It is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father that speaketh in you.—Matt. 10: 20.

Time—October, November, A. D. 29. Five or six months before the Crucifixion.

Place—In Northern Perea, east of the Jordan.

During this quarter the International Committee has given twelve lessons which reveal in concrete form some of the important and fundamental truths which should characterize ideal human action. If the scholar sees merely an historical Christ, whose teachings are only moral homilies, and fails to behold a living Christ, whose Presence is waiting to fill the whole earth today, and whose messages are for this age as truly as for any age, the value of the quarter's study will have been wholly lost.

Today's recital is a lesson in practical missionary and evangelistic endeavor. It reveals an organized attempt to carry the gospel literally into every city and into every home. Seventy men are chosen from the ranks to become the Evangelists of a practical faith that was to bring peace into every life that would accept it.

These men were missionaries in the true sense, called to do team work in the propagation of a saving message to be applied both to the bodies and souls of the people. They were to be fore-runners of the Messiah, preparing the way of the Lord, both by their messages and their good deeds.

It was only a few months until the Crucifixion, and the demand for workers was imperative. These seventy by prayer and by example were to be winners of others, who in turn would carry the message of redemption to the multitudes.

Christ's redemption was for the body no less than for the soul. "Heal the sick." Good deeds and salvation go hand in hand. One is the complement of the other. The Church has not proclaimed a full gospel so long as it has left unassailed the disease breeding cesspools of the city slums and the fever-laden districts of our tumble down tenements.

The fact that all would not accept the truth did not mark failure on the part of the seventy. The failure was on the part of those who turned a deaf ear to the truth, who by their infidelity merited for themselves the woes pronounced upon the disobedient and unbelieving.

How typical is this lesson of the present day! Christ is moving among the nations of the earth, and He is calling for Evangelists to do team work in preparation for His truth. Witness the teams which are now preparing for the canvass of the United Missionary Campaign in March, and other great movements of the day, which are preparing the way for the coming of the Lord of Hosts into the hearts of the multitudes of earth. Christ's method of procedure has set the pace for all the ages in practical religious activity.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR

January 11.

Topic — Purpose, Persistency, and Power in Prayer.—Matt. 7: 7-11.

Lack of purpose makes prayer a mockery. Prayer is based upon the consciousness of a need, either in one's self or in others. Pray for something definite.

The selfish prayer is unavailing. Prayers are unanswered because we ask amiss. Prayer must harmonize with our highest aspirations and with God's purposes.

The persistent supplication of the righteous availeth. Christ taught an important lesson establishing the truth of this statement. Remember Jacob's "I will not let thee go except thou bless me."

The prayer of power is the prayer of faith. He that believeth receiveth. Prayer is communion and communion brings power. Association with strong, intellectual commanding spirits always gives a sense of confidence. Association with God begets a strength of spirit, a power in service that can be gained in no other way.

Pray for new inspiration, wisdom and strength for your local Christian Endeavor Society, and for guidance during the year 1914, that the Society and each member may become a source of blessing to the entire community. More victories are won by prayer than the world dreams of, so the poet sang. If only we would put this mighty truth to the practical test!

PILGRIMAGE AT CHAPPAQUA

The first pilgrimage of the New Year, under the care of the Joint Fellowship Committee of New York, representing the Groups which met in a "Group Conference" in New York last winter, will be held at Chappaqua Meeting (Orthodox) on First month 11th. Friends are invited to attend the meeting at 11:00 a. m., and to remain for the business session of Chappaqua Monthly Meeting, which convenes at the close of the afternoon conference. The conference subject will be "Of What Use is My Own Religion." Friends are requested to bring thoughts on the subject. A box luncheon will be served at noon. Train leaves Grand Central Terminal for Chappaqua at 9:05. All interested are most cordially invited to attend.

We acknowledge with appreciation the receipt of an appropriate card of Christmas greetings from the Twentieth Street Meeting in New York City, signed by Bertha H. T. Ufford, Clerk.

CORRESPONDENCE

Wichita, Kansas, Dec. 8, 1913.

THE AMERICAN FRIEND is an excellent Christian Weekly with which I am much pleased. The number last week was unusually good. Let me say with Charles E. Tebbetts, that the "Working Program" of the Methodist denomination ought to appeal to our own membership in large degree. Even more freely and emphatically, am I with Harry R. Keates in urging the present imperative "Need of Aggressive Evangelism," as the most insistent demand of the hour in the American Society of Friends. WILLIAM L. PEARSON.

TAKE NOTICE

After January 1, 1914, all my Bible School publishing and supply business will be in the hands of the Bible School Board of the Five Year Meeting. This Board should be addressed for all Bible School Publications and Supplies. The business will be located at Fairmount, Indiana. The address will be as follows: The American Friends' Bible School Board, Fairmount, Indiana.

Sincerely yours,

P. W. RAIDABAUGH.

Why not remember some friend by giving them a year's subscription to THE AMERICAN FRIEND? Or, why not secure at least one new subscription by solicitation, and send it in within the next week? Why not?

35 BUSHELS PER ACRE
was the yield of WHEAT on many farms in Western Canada in 1913, some yields being reported as high as 50 bushels per acre. As high as 100 bushels were recorded in some districts for oats, 50 bushels for barley and from 10 to 20 bushels for flax.

J. Keys arrived in the country 5 years ago from Denmark with very little means. He homesteaded, worked hard, is now the owner of 320 acres of land, in 1913 had a crop of 200 acres, which will realize him about $4,000. His wheat weighed 68 lbs. to the bushel and averaged over 35 bushels to the acre.

Thousands of similar instances might be related of the homesteaders in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

The crop of 1913 was an abundant one everywhere in Western Canada.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL, PENNSYLVANIA

To the Readers of The American Friend:

In the first issue of each month of the year 1914, the readers of THE AMERICAN FRIEND may expect to find a page which will set forth some of the characteristics of Westtown School. The series of short chapters will present its history, aims and spirit. It will portray its physical equipment and its varied educational work. It will depict the daily life of the pupils, with their recreations in and out of doors. It will be more than an instantaneous view, it will be a moving picture. The bits of past history, the full representation of the present, and the glimpses of plans and hopes for the future, will reveal something of the movement of the school by which it grows and strengthens and adapts itself to new demands and conditions.

I have spoken of these monthly papers as chapters, but they are really personal letters to the readers of THE AMERICAN FRIEND, from one who has been closely identified with Westtown for all but seven of the past fifty years, and who for a year or more has occupied the position of principal. Out of a large knowledge of the past and present, and of a clear vision of the future, there springs the conviction that Westtown has a service in a constantly widening field. To carry into this field some knowledge of the school as it is, and as it hopes soon to be, is the object of these letters.

There are many old Westtown scholars scattered over the whole country to whom these messages may come as from their childhood's home, telling of change and growth. There are many others who have heard of the old school from their parents or grandparents and who will be glad to know what it may be today. I trust there are not a few who will read the letters with great attention, to see whether this is the school to which they should send their own children.

In the remainder of this letter I wish to present some of the advantages which Westtown derives from its proximity to Philadelphia.

The Friends of Philadelphia form a small community, a little over 4000, but they are close together in every way. We are no longer divided into hostile camps, in open conflict or in armed truce; we have come together, and beaten our swords into plowshares and our spears into pruning hooks. We differ on many points, but we stand shoulder to shoulder on our broad common ground. There is great liberty of action, great liberty of opinion, but a close heartfelt unity in our corporate proceedings. Such a condition has produced deeper spiritual life, and developed strong and vigorous characters, and our meetings reap the benefits of it all.

As our hearts are warmed toward each other until we have come together in one united brotherhood in spite of minor differences of opinion, so when a Friend comes among us from a distance preaching the same gospel which we surely believe, though, as one of our Friends put it, he has not been to our barber or to our tailor, we extend to him the open hand of fellowship. As a result, we are reaping the benefit which arises from our central geographical position. The Quaker communities which exchange visits with each other reach north and south from Canada to North Carolina, and east and west from Great Britain to California. Philadelphia lies very near to the center of gravity of this whole system of Meetings. We are on the direct line of travel between the northern and southern seaboard Yearly Meetings, and Friends going between the middle west and New York and New England naturally pass through our city. English and Irish Friends in increasing numbers are visiting this country. They nearly always travel through us, often lingering both as they come and go. It seldom happens that there are not one or two prominent Friends from other regions in temporary residence with us, attending our Meetings, addressing our assemblies, and mingling with our social gatherings. We are at the cross-roads of Quaker travel and some latch-strings are always out. Many Friends from other Yearly Meetings reside here more or less permanently. We have a flourishing Earlham Club, and a still larger Ohio Circle composed of the Friends from the Barnesville Meeting. At the evening session of a recent conference, attended by one thousand of our people, there were three addresses, one by Ruby Davis of Indiana, another by Rufus M. Jones of New England, and the third by Alfred C. Garrett of our own city.

Westtown School is only twenty-four miles from Philadelphia. The various currents of Quaker thought which pass through that city sweep out to us and freshen our lives. Our whole Senior class of forty-nine attended the conference that has just been mentioned. The most earnest of our own people come out here and talk to us on religion and social topics. Most of the Friendly visitors to Philadelphia pay us a visit, and when they are public Friends we make an opportunity for them to address the school. Many of the missionaries laboring to the eastward of us have at one time and another been made welcome at the school. Before and after the Five Years Meeting last year fourteen Friends from England and Ireland were here, and most of them spoke to the children. I think there is no other school on the continent where children will meet so many prominent Friends from so many different regions, and with such varied concerns.

Strange as it may seem to some, I believe that Philadelphia is rapidly becoming a cosmopolitan center of Quakerism. Fifteen or twenty years hence, when the boys and girls who come to us now shall have become leaders in their various Friendly communities, it will be a very pleasant and a very profitable thing, and will tend toward the unity of Quakerism, for them to be intimately acquainted with some of the leaders of the movements of the Philadelphia Friends of that day.

THE TWO WATCHERS

ELIZABETH WEST PARKER

'Most every day, when I get up,
The sun looks in at me,
And sends a shining ray to say,
"I'm rising, too, you see."

And then he warms all out of doors,
So I may go and play,
While from the sky his yellow eye
Watches me every way.

And, when at last I go to bed,
He goes behind the hill;
But pretty soon there is the moon
To keep watch o'er me still.

Sometimes with his whole beaming face
The moon laughs jollily,
And then again that's gone, but he Keeps half an eye on me.

So I'm not frightened when it's dark,
I know clouds are to blame,
And just behind them sun and moon
Are watching just the same.

WHY ETHEL WAS MOURNFUL

A little girl had sent back her plate for turkey two or three times, and had been helped bountifully to all the other good things that go to make a grand dinner. Finally she was observed looking rather disconsolately at her unfinished dish of plum pudding. "What's the matter, Ethel?" asked Uncle John; "you look mournful." "That's the trouble," said Ethel, "I'm more'n full." Then she wondered why everybody laughed.—Continued.

Prayer

OH, Dear Father of us all!
Who hears Thy children when they call,
We lift our voices full of praise
To thank Thee for life's happy days;
For sun and cloud and starlit blue,
For all thy mercies ever new,
For beauteous earth, for fragrant flower,
For music crowding every hour,
For friends and loves, and daily task,
For riches more than we could ask.
Oh, life is glad and full of glee!
And all our gladness is from Thee.

'Tis Yule-tide now, the old year dies,
The new year comes with glad surprise,
Oh, hear the prayer of faith we raise
For help throughout the coming days!
Enlarge our vision, let us see
The glories that are yet to be;
Give strength of life and daily grace
To struggle with the common-place;
Give love more deep and tender when
We labor with the sons of men;
Give faith unfaltering, full and strong
To overcome with good the wrong.

Dear Lord, as is Thy holy will Thy every thought in us fulfil,
Until throughout the year we move
With smile and song and glowing love,
To lift the burdens, smooth the way,
Make glad the life, enrich the day,
Of some awearied with their load
Our fellow travelers on the road;
May every task 'tis ours to claim
Be gladly done in Thy dear name;
And all the glory wilt Thou take,
The blessing ours, for Thy dear sake.

In the World of Action

At a meeting of the Chicago Peace Society on December 7th, a resolution was adopted, petitioning President Wilson and Secretary of State Bryan to do all within their power to insure the assembling of a third Hague Peace Conference. Other resolutions were adopted in favor of an international agreement for the suspension of the building of battleships and thanking Congress for the defeat of the Militia Pay bill and the bill providing for a Commission of National defense.

The current issue of the National Service League Notes in England is entitled "Special Non-conformists Number" and has been widely circulated among the Free Churchmen of this country. Among other interesting matter is an article entitled "The Quaker Point of View," which consists in the main of two quotations, one from George Fox and another from Isaac Pennington. The avowed object of the reprinting of these extracts is "effectually to dispose of any idea that they did not recognize the use and actual necessity of force and a resort to 'the sword of justice'."

"The evangelization of the world must be accomplished in this generation," declared Dr. Robert E. Speer, of New York City, in an address to the Student Volunteer convention at Kansas City, the evening of January 1st. L. L. Kinsolving, of South Brazil, bishop of the Episcopal Church, emphasized the needs of Latin-America for more missionaries. Previously 8,000 students and visitors listened to impassioned appeals from natives of China and Japan and from missionaries returned from India and South America for help in meeting what was characterized as the greatest opportunity Christianity has ever had.

Dr. John T. McFarland, editor of the Sunday School Publications of the M. E. Church, died week before last at his home in Maplewood, a suburb of New York. He was born in Indiana in 1851 and was president of Iowa Wesleyan University for seven years. He was elected to the head of the editorial department of the Sunday School supplies of his denomination in 1904.

The Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions occupies seven fields in China, with 148 organized Churches and a membership of 25,311. Of these 2,986 were added the past year. This accession is fully twelve per cent of last year's membership, while in the United States the accessions barely reached seven per cent. These missions maintain 472 schools, in which 13,000 children are being taught. There are 15,000 in the Sabbath Schools. The American force of workers, which has been sent out from the New York office now numbers 346.

The resolution for a prohibitory amendment to the Federal constitution, which has been introduced in both branches of Congress, by Senator Morris Sheppard and Congressman R. P. Hobson, is as follows: Section 1—The sale, manufacture for sale, transportation for sale, importation for sale, and exportation for sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes in the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are forever prohibited. Section 2—Congress shall have power to provide for the manufacture, sale, importation and transportation of intoxicating liquors for sacramental, medicinal, mechanical, pharmaceutical or scientific purposes, or for use in the arts, and shall have power to enforce this article by all needful legislation.

The Methodist Episcopal Church has a membership of 3,944,055, being a gain of 423,858 within the past year. It is estimated that fully two-thirds of a million souls found salvation at Methodist altars last year. That denomination has more than 35,000 local congregations.

Faith

(Contributed)

O ye of little faith! Though born to soar, why suffer ye a wind so slight to baffle ye.—Dante.

Ye of little faith! What sting there is in the words! Consider this fine passage from Chesterton's "Heretics":

When he (man) drops one doctrine after another in a refined skepticism, when he declines to tie himself to a system, when he says that he has outgrown definitions, when he says that he disbelieves in finality, when, in his own imaginations, he sits as God, holding no form of creed but contemplating all, then he is, by that very process, sinking slowly backwards into the vagueness of the vagrant animals and the unconsciousness of the grass. Trees have no dogmas. Turnips are singularly broad-minded.

Faith, religion, social creed may too much console a man for the afflictions of others. But unless he has faith, religion, social BELIEF, he is dead, certainly worthless to relieve the afflictions of others. * * *

Next Week

Among many other good things which will appear in THE AMERICAN FRIEND next week will be an article on "The Evergreen Life," by Charles M. Woodman; a message to Friends on "Work," by John Henry Douglas, and an article on "Socialism Not Christianity," by S. H. Hodges. Other good material is being held over for succeeding issues.

The Church Must Be Progressive

The Church is under the highest obligations to render a faithful account of its stewardship. Of all the human factors that contribute to the uplift of mankind, the Christian Church stands at the head. By no sort of logic can it fail to strive for the best in its heart life and in its activities. The Church must be progressive or it will die, for life is progressive.

The Church must minister to the age of which it is a part, or failure will be its certain destiny. The vital weakness of the established Church of the seventeenth century was that it had no sympathetic touch with the spirit of the age, preached no gospel that would meet the conscious human needs of that period, and above all else was trying to perpetuate a formal faith and a traditional mode of worship among a generation that was starving to death for lack of proper spiritual nourishment. The existing ecclesiasticism which tried to live by formulæ, and whose ministrations had grown mechanical, was apparently unable to reform either its polity or its discipline, with the result that a spiritual revolution broke out which swept over all England under the leadership of George Fox and his followers.

History is in danger of repeating itself. The Church has no greater temptation to strive against than the temptation to live in the past, to emphasize dogmatic ecclesiasticism as a substitute for the practical methods of winning souls in this generation, to lock the door against all procedure that does not harmonize with custom. It may be that the Church of this age has the ability to work out its own reformation. The signs are portentuous in this direction. Within a half dozen years the evidences have multiplied that the Church is being moved by the consciousness of its mission to save the world, and is determined to give the fullest account of its stewardship. But there can be no turning back. The great problems that have to do with human uplift and redemption are pressing mightily for solution. These problems center in the sacrificial death on Calvary, but the roads that lead to Calvary are multitudinous.

God is not restricted in His methods by which men and women are led to Jesus Christ. The vital element in salvation is that humanity really find its Savior, whether it be by way of the preaching service or from home training; by the direct leading of the Spirit or at the revival altar; by Salvation Army methods or through a Billy Sunday appeal; at the Bowery mission or by the leading of the street-corner preacher; by the ministrations of the city missionary or the paternal care of a Settlement House. The Church has not at all times learned readily the lesson of adjusting its methods to the changing needs of progressive human society.

One of the most wonderful events of current religious history is the recent conversion of Ex-Governor Patterson of Tennessee. Following a life of sin and devotion to the liquor interests, deep trouble and personal humiliation came upon him, and in the hour of his darkness, a Methodist pastor wrote him a brief message of sympathy and begged him to find relief by accepting the Lord Jesus Christ. The most astounding fact about this entire dramatic episode was revealed in the reply of the Governor to the minister: "You are the first man who has ever spoken to me about my soul."

Probably half the people in the United States are not touched by the gospel in any vital sense. The times demand that the Church shall not stand upon custom or ceremony when the eternal destiny of the multitudes of earth is at stake. Dogmas and traditions and formulæ will be a poor defense in the day of final reckoning against the cry of myriads of human souls who clamored for the light and found it not.

Our plea is not for revolution or for the disturbance of well grounded Christian faith. That is not involved in this message. We do not suggest even that practices shall be discarded because they are old. To do that is just as unreasonable as to condemn all procedure because it is new. That is not involved in this message. It is not our concern that there shall be a change in the fundamental tenets of our doctrine and belief. We are not discussing that phase of the Church's problems.

Our concern solely is that the Church of Christ shall get out of the ruts; that it shall prove itself flexible enough in all its procedure to meet the present day requirements of every age; that it shall be open hearted and open minded to receive the revelations of God as they are visited upon His people who have a purpose to be obedient to the truth; that it shall measure up to its high mission of witnessing effectively for God, at home and in every land. "Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward." That is God's message to the Church of this generation.

We have written this especially for its application to the Society of Friends in America. The time has come when as a body we should realize more largely upon our investments of faith for generations past. We need on the one hand to develop an energy and a program of purpose to which we are yet largely strangers, and on the other hand, in the face of the vexing problems that concern the destiny of human life and human souls, we must be ready to adjust our methods of procedure to the demands of high Christian obligations.

That Convention of Men

We are delighted at the interest which is being manifested in the suggestion of a conference of men Friends to talk over some of our vital denominational problems. Even the little opposition that has developed will help to center popular thought among our membership upon what our problems really are.

It is quite apparent that all have not understood the situation. Probably there are many who do not comprehend the existence of a need upon which the suggestion of a conference has been based. To such as these surface and incidental difficulties will readily present themselves. But objections to methods of procedure do not help in the least degree to meet the problems which the conference would be called to consider. The existence of the problems is the vital point in the matter, and it is our conviction that Friends should be more deeply burdened for their solution than concerned about the manner in which the solution may be reached. We believe that the time has come for constructive effort beyond what has yet been attempted among Friends.

In some of the recent conferences of the United Mission Campaign which were in Friends territory, the absence and inattention of Friends was lamentable. It may be argued that this is not distinctly a Friends movement and that others can be depended upon to make the conferences a success. But that is quite aside from the point. The problem in the matter is that Friends are missing golden opportunities which will not come again very soon.

The purpose is not to make these United Mission meetings a success for their own sake, but that by proper interest being shown, every denomination will get out of these gatherings a wealth of uplift and inspiration that will mean an enlargement of their own work. The irresponsibility which a host of our members feel when such opportunities are brought to their very doors is alarming. We cite this merely as evidence of a condition among Friends that should be the object of our deepest solicitude.

We have all rejoiced at the vision which came to the Five Years Meeting in October of 1912, and have taken satisfaction in the system of organization which was developed at that time. Fifteen months of operation under this system has revealed the probable fact that we are over-organized, until the mass of our membership gets the burden of our organized activities upon their hearts more than is yet apparent. Until a larger proportion of our members is willing to give these Boards their active and sympathetic support, financially and morally, the work is bound to lag distressingly. This is one of the things which the United Mission Campaign would correct if given right of way in our various meetings.

The problems before us are numerous and vital and must be speedily solved if Friends in America are to maintain their rightful heritage. One of the saddest things to contemplate is the fact that whenever a call is made to go forward into a larger denominational life, we are inevitably met with the cry that the advancement is interfering with some tradition of the Church. It is by such procedure that the heart is taken out of men and women who want to see the Church prosper and are ready to make any sacrifice in that direction.

When we remember the exclusive and commendable efforts which our Quaker women are putting forth along Missionary lines, and in some Yearly Meetings along social service and Christian fellowship lines, we cannot believe that the autonomy of the denomination is going to be seriously disturbed, if the men of the Church get together for friendly counsel about some of our vital politics and procedures, in which the men of necessity ought to be taking a leading part.

Our conviction is strong that the Friends of America are at the cross-roads of their history. If our Quaker men, by getting together, and being deeply concerned about our present situation, can become an inspiration to the whole body and suggest methods of procedure, which, when later approved by the whole Church in an official capacity, men and women Friends acting together, will bring new life to the entire body, who is there to say nay? The important thing now is to get a conference, free from conventionality and constitutional restraint, that will dare to look problems of procedure squarely in the face and stay with them until a plausible solution is found, when they can be turned over to the Church as a whole to be approved or rejected as the Church is minded to do. What do Friends think about it?

It is a great thing to live so that others seeing our example will want to know Jesus Christ. And yet that is the standard which has been set for all of us.

The Duty of the Church to the Community

BY RUFUS M. JONES

The founders of our Society, in the mid-seventeenth century, endeavored to return to primitive Christianity, the Christianity of the Gospels. In no one feature of this great undertaking did they succeed in a higher degree than in their recovery of the original Christian estimate of the infinite value of man.

To them a human life, any human life, was of inestimable worth, of infinite value, not because it could be used as an instrument for increasing the wealth of the world, not because it had capacity for labor, or for the defense of the nation, or for any economic reason whatever, but because it was unspeakably precious to God and because it possessed inexhaustible possibilities of life. This was a new, a unique and a liberating word to the world. In the power of their insight they protested, with the authority of ancient prophets, against the world's cheap estimate of the value of man. He was never made, they insisted, to be a human target in battle, he was never divinely destined to lie in foul prisons, or to hang on gibbets, he was not created to be made a drunken sot or to be turned into a dumb beast of toil.

The far-reaching and multiform humanitarian work of early Friends was not undertaken like so much of the relief work of the middle ages, because they hoped thereby to win favor with God and heap up saving merit for their own souls. They had sounded the real spiritual nature of salvation too deeply to allow of that blunder. They flung themselves with consecration into the great human tasks of the world because they had discovered anew the ineffable love of God for men and because they saw, in some measure as Christ did, the infinite possibilities of a man's life—any man's life.

What they did not see, what they could not then have seen, was the organic nature, the conjunct character of human life, by which I mean the way the individual grows, develops, finds himself and is formed in and by the social environment into which he is born. Our problem today is vastly larger than the problem of individual betterment. We see now, as plainly as we see the facts of nature, that we cannot adequately help or relieve, or liberate or save men or women or little children, unless we first change the conditions under which they live—unless we first transform the environment, which works as silently as the fall of the snowflakes and yet as irresistibly as the forces that pull the tides of the ocean, to make them what they are.

It is our modern spiritual problem not only to love and treat in a human way the defective child, the clay-shattered individual, the so-called degenerate, but even more, to change, as far as it is humanly possible to do so, the social conditions which are producing this appalling and menacing crop of defectives. We who have in the past taught the few how to worship in spirit and in truth and how to find God in the hush and silence, must now share in this further mission and service of spiritualizing the environment, of Christianizing the social order, and of making it possible for persons to be born into the kind of world in which they may become the noble and divine thing God meant them to be. We have gone far enough already to discover that the real remedy for social ills cannot be found in the panacea of some political party. It cannot be found alone in some act of legislature. The complications that have followed the passage of the act to improve the condition of women laborers show how difficult it is to reach the heart of the matter by legislation. No more can the problem be solved by any program of socialism. It is a rainbow dream to expect to create a golden society by any re-arrangement of these same old leaden individual units. It is a problem which can be solved only by the deeper spiritual remedies of religion. There is no magic by which a wrong world can be juggled into a right world. There is no easy alchemy by which bad moral conditions can be transmuted into good ones. In the last resort it is a problem which only the Church of Christ can solve, but, once awakened, vivified, equipped and unified for the task, the Church can solve it.

For city meetings, at the present stage, the most important steps, I think, are: (1) the formation of small study-groups for the corporate study of the urgent social problems of the time and for the reading of the most suggestive books now available; and (2) a far closer acquaintance with the work being done by the various social service agencies of the city and a far deeper interest and co-operation in the work of these existing agencies.

But my special concern is that our rural meetings shall have a more adequate sense of responsibility for the social and spiritual life of their communities. Overseers of meetings used to feel that they had done their duty if they scrupulously looked after the moral and ceremonial life of the membership and could bring in the answers to the Queries without too many crutches. We are beginning to discover that we cannot live unto ourselves even as a Society, that we have hardly glimpsed our mission when we have succeeded only in looking after our own members. A live meeting in any country district today must be a radiating center of moral and spiritual activities for the social transformation of the region in which it is located.

The concrete and definite needs are much alike in all rural neighborhoods:

(1) One of the first things needed is the cultivation of community-spirit, that is, the stimulation of movements and tendencies that will foster the religious group-spirit in the community, and concentrate as far as possible all the uplifting and spiritualizing influences.

(2) It is everywhere a part of the rural problem how to increase and widen the scope of life in the country. This calls for the encouragement of scientific farming, the opening of avenues for talents of any sort, sympathetic co-operation with the constructive influences in the community, and the discovery of interests that will appeal to the energy of youth. If meetings are to live and flourish, some way must be found to keep the robust and vigorous young people in the country, and to make them feel that the Meeting itself is a powerful factor in the vitalization of the neighborhood life.

(3) One of the most important pieces of social service work which a rural meeting can undertake is the provision of a trained nurse for the district. The entire community should, if possible, co-operate in the financial support of the nurse, but she should be a person who can minister to the spiritual life as well as to the physical body. She should be provided for the community by the Church and she should be an organic part of its life and mission.

(4) One of the most urgent needs in every rural district is spiritual leadership. It is not a church pastor that is primarily needed; it is a new kind of person who is not an official at all. It may be a man or it may be a woman, but in any case it must be some one who loves the country and country life, who understands rural ways and habits, who knows enough economics and sociology to deal wisely with the tangled problems that confront every community, who can inspire and stimulate the young people, who can organize and direct groups for the study of local problems, and some one who is ready to give his life, as the missionary does in the foreign field, to the spiritual mission and the constructive tasks of rural neighborhoods here at home.

It has been proved by the experience of the foreign field that young men and women of the highest quality accept with joy the hardships and perils of the work, and the sacrifice of home and companionship. They go because they feel the call and because they find here a task which challenges the noblest spirit in them. We must now open the way for the flower of our youth to feel the same challenging call to turn in and help us make our meetings centers of moral and spiritual transformation for the community.

But all this will not happen while we wait in happy lassitude with folded hands and placid, optimistic smiles. If we are to save the day for Quakerism, or better still, for spiritual Christianity, we must exercise statesmanship, we must plan for great things, and we must fearlessly, with high faith in God, go forward. There is no occasion for our drying up at this stage of our history, no reason for the termination of our spiritual service to the world, no excuse for our dying out in a world that desperately needs us—no excuse for our failure to see what the times require and to adapt ourselves to the actual needs of the world we are trying to help. It sounds brave, perhaps, to talk of nailing colors to the mast and of going down with the flag flying! But it is much better to nail colors to the mast and keep the ship sailing with its splendid freight. We have great truths as our legacies and we are the inheritors of very precious ideals, but that furnishes us no sanction to shut our eyes to the actual facts of life or to the real conditions of human society, and to decline to employ the methods that will enable us to fulfill the "commission" which the Head of the Church has given us.

I have spoken of the importance of leadership for the accomplishment of our social tasks, but something else is needed too. Nothing, after all, can take the place of corporate responsibility and the solidarity of group-life and group-spirit. Leaders we must have, but the true leader is always a person who kindles others, helps them find themselves and guides them in well-directed lines of activity; he does not relieve them of their duties and responsibilities and tasks. There will be no great Quakerism anywhere where the group-spirit dies out or where it runs low. This is one of the inherent weaknesses of professional baseball, if I may in high company with St. Paul make use of an athletic figure. In this game there are a few performers so highly trained and specialized that they play like intricate machines, while the great army of spectators sitting on the benches are just onlookers—"fans" they are called—who are neither doing anything toward winning the game nor contributing anything toward the formation of their own skill or the building up of their own physical fibre. We want no "fan" system in our Quakerism. On the contrary, we want the whole level of the membership raised, we want the entire life of the Society deepened and set into action. Team-work, esprit-de-corps, the fusing of the body, central loyalty in the group, are absolutely essential for any great and dynamic Quakerism either in city or country.

Our young members are feeling a new enthusiasm, as are the young Friends in England, and they are eager to contribute their best to the Society and to its mission; only they want to be convinced that the Society has a mission and is going forward to fulfill it. If they are to feel at home in the Monthly Meeting, were they really belong, they must be shown that the Monthly Meeting is doing live business in the world of today and that something mighty is going forward. Let them once see that their Monthly Meeting is consecrated to the transformation of their neighborhood and that its central business is helping to realize the Kingdom of God in that particular region of the earth, they will say "yes" to any call for help or for loyalty. It is not something soft and easy that they are seeking. They want something that greatly matters, something that involves sacrifice and hazard and that appeals to the heroic spirit in them. We should still have James Parnells if only the occasion called them out.

In Isaiah's vision the cherubim are creatures of perfect service. "Each one had six wings. With twain he covered his face, with twain he covered his feet, and with twain he did fly." His very powers of activity are employed to express his reverence—with twain he covered his face—and to express his humility—with twain he did cover himself to his feet. But reverence and humility are not enough. They are essential to high service, but God's messengers go when they are sent. They are ready when the call comes—"with twain he did fly."

Christ's Call to Righteousness

BY H. EDWIN MCGREW

John 4: 28—"The woman then left her water-pot."

Winter in Palestine had well nigh slipped away. The hillsides were brightening with their carpets of grass and growing grain. The sun climbed higher toward the zenith and the promise of springtime was in air and sky, in field and orchard.

Jesus, the young preacher from Nazareth, with his disciples, must go into Galilee and they "must needs go through Samaria." Weary with his journey the Galileean sits beside Jacob's well alone while his disciples go into the city to purchase provisions. While thus waiting their return he enters presently into conversation with a woman of Samaria, who had come there with her large earthen pitcher upon her head, that she might fill it with water and carry it back to her home. The conversation was candid, clear, direct, and behold a transformed life with a new purpose. The woman then left her water-pot and went upon a new and unthought-of mission. Caught in the spell of a new vision she left what had seemed to her the supreme task of her life.

Active life is one constant round of choosing and rejecting. How noticeable in child life. A new toy is so absorbing, the old rattle and ring are thrown aside, then the toy gives place to the ball, the ball to the splendid prancing stick horses, then they to the auto coaster, then games, and school, then profession or business. And so the all absorbing doll and playhouse give place to books and sports and college life, then life's broader duties stretching out into the years. Nothing is more pathetic than a life that is arrested in its development. Pitiful the man who has never put away childish things, the woman whose life is still absorbed by dolls and playhouses.

Jesus came into the world that He might redeem it and to show men and women higher ideals and to discover to them pathways to the realization of ideals. He came to men who with downcast eyes grovelled in the earth that He might lift weary eyelids until they should behold lands of far distances. He came to women so absorbed in things material and temporal that He might open their eyes to the unseen and eternal. He was the greatest teacher of men. Judah and Galilee were stirred from their centers to their remotest boundaries, and the fame of Him spread abroad beyond the confines of His native country.

And what was thy message, O thou young preacher of Galilee? Listen while upon the astonished ear falls His first great commandment, while before the eyes of the Galileean multitude and the eyes of the groveling world He lifts the supreme ideal when He says, "Be ye therefore perfect." What is this He is saying? It is that character is the thing fundamental in the kingdom of heaven and ever before a groveling multitude and ever before a sordid world he holds his own sinless, stainless, spotless, crystal life and says "follow me." "Be perfect," and no ideal less can make Christian character.

And for the attainment of such character He gives not only an ideal but imparts Himself to the lives of men. The first commandment is fundamental and is personal, but the second is social. Holiness is goodness incarnate, righteousness is goodness at work. The Christ calls to righteousness as well as to holiness and cries, "A new commandment, I give unto you that ye love one another."

Men never really see Jesus Christ without hearing that commandment. His hand points not to cloister nor to holy ease, but to hovel and tenement row and mine and factory and sweatshop and street where weak and weary and discouraged the millions labor, and He says love another.

All too long we have said the crowd is vulgar and we must not soil our garments and our hands, and all too long we have forgotten that the cleanest hands in all history are those which touched the beggar in his rags, the leper in his loathsomeness, and mixed the clay to anoint the eyes of the blind man. The peril of contamination comes from flaws and scars and conditions within, rather than conditions without.

He demands that man shall be to the man and woman shall be to the woman as the "shadow of a great rock in a weary land." Oh, let us go out in the power of His love to enthrone the Kingly Christ in the hearts of those who know Him not! And no one looks long upon his true vision of the Christ until he sees a scarred hand pointing the way that leads to the wilderness, where men know not faith and women weep without hope and little children grope in the darkness, and His children cannot look long as that hand points the way until they hear Him say again, "Go ye into all the world and preach my gospel to every creature."

When His character and His love becomes a part of the life then is born the impulse for service. Yes, that is the great word for today. Thanks for the mission of the monk of the other days, for whatever of mission he performed, but today the unevangelized millions turn weary eyes toward a dawning morning, lift parched lips for the water of life and stretch long, slender arms for the bread from heaven. Hear it! The evangelization of the world is the supreme task of the Church, and until the last of China's millions and Japan's millions and India's millions and Africa's millions and the millions elsewhere shall learn that the Son of Man hath power on earth to forgive sin, until the sick and the blind and the lame shall know of the Great Physician, and that there is balm for healing, evangelization must continue our supreme task.

These are days in which history is being made, history permeated and throbbing with the influence of the gospel. The Son of Man is journeying in every country and into every condition of life. Yes, the active, working Church of Jesus Christ is making history and you may have part in it.

In the beauty of the lilies Christ was born across the sea,
With a glory in His bosom that transfigures you and me.
As He died to make men holy, let us die to make men free,
For God is marching on.

But you say there are so many other claims in life—so many obligations, duties, tasks, privileges. Can there be after a quiet interview with Him? The woman then left her water-pot. Why? Oh, the small things of life were overshadowed by the greater ones. She found herself compelled by a new vision. A new uplift of soul was here and she gladly hurried with the evangel to her own people. Happy evangel it was and almost the whole city responded to her message and Christ found place in many hearts.

Oh, woman of Samaria, thou bearer of water-pots, thou whose transformed life is compelled by a new impulse, listen while Israel's poet prophet sings agan, "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace, that bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation; that saith unto Zion, Thy God reigneth."

All great lives are compelled lives, compelled by the higher ideal, the holier purpose, the broader vision. Every life that is rich in service is one that has been made willing to leave the water-pot for life's higher tasks.

We love our quiet little city, lying close by the sun-kissed side of the Puente hills, where we breathe the perfume of orange blossoms and are fanned by the cooling breezes from the restless stretches of the great sea, but some of our friends have left it all as the woman left her water-pot. A greater vision has taken some to the Artic snows and some to the torrid heat below the Tropic, and some to the Island Empire, and some to the throbbing new life of China, and some to the weird and beast-like blacks underneath the equator, and some to festering spots in great cities where pestilence and disease are and where God is not known; and some to live in less favored communities to build their homes and rear their households where needs of others hold them fast.

Oh, my young friends, moments of interview with Jesus Christ are among earth's rarest privileges. Conventions like this are rich in the realization of His very presence, but it would be most sad if a time like this gave no new impulse to a larger life and a richer ministry. Oh, heed not the neglected water-pot if the privileges and claims of His evangel possess your soul, and God grant that one day your heart may be made glad to see a redeemed throng bowing at the feet of Him who now sends you forth to proclaim His message of salvation.

With souls redeemed and crowns won may we cast our crowns at the feet of the world's Redeemer and together repeat, "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name be the glory forever and ever."

Homiletic Review

The Homiletic Review for January has a number of articles on Religious Education that should be carefully pondered by every minister in America. Prof. P. T. Forsythe of Hackney College, London, has a strong article on "Music and Worship." Other informing and helpful articles are in this number. In the department of Sermonic Literature, there are contributions by some well known clergymen. Published Monthly by Funk & Wagnalls Co., 354-360 4th Ave., New York City. $3.00 a year.

About That Conference of Men

Short editorials in THE AMERICAN FRIEND for Twelfth month 11 and 18 suggest calling a conference of men "to consider our denominational needs and the best way to meet them." The Five Years Meeting met a little over a year ago and went over about the same ground which the suggested conference would cover. To the writer it seems far wiser to direct our energies toward carrying out the resolutions and plans of the Five Years Meeting for the present than to attempt to formulate more. But apart from the question whether additional deliberations of the kind suggested is needed at this time, the editorials referred to carry another thought which invites serious consideration.

Ever since the rise of the Society of Friends, women have occupied a more prominent place in its affairs than in those of any other religious denomination of which the writer has knowledge, unless we except the Salvation Army. Within the memory of many now living, the majority of Friends advanced from their original position regarding this matter, and accorded women their full and equal share in all matters pertaining to our branch of the Church. The abolishment of the separate business meetings for men and women bears witness. This abolishment paved the way for the insertion of the clause in our present discipline: "There are no distinctions in the rights, privileges or responsibilities of the members because of sex."

And now comes a persistent suggestion from the official organ of the Five Years Meeting of Friends in America that we call a conference to consider important matters in our denominational work, from which women are to be excluded. The editor "would like to know how it impresses our membership." The member who signs this article is little less than amazed. Into what we have accomplished for sex equality shall we now, deliberately, drive a wedge to open a line of sex cleavage?

Another phase of the suggestion demands consideration. A conference of men from the Methodist Church, and which appeared to be for the benefit of that body, is put forth as sponsor for the idea that a conference of men among Friends would be for our benefit. There is no doubt that a conference of earnest Christian men in the Methodist Church did good. But the Methodists, as a whole, have not yet attained to the advanced ground which we profess to hold regarding the equality of the sexes. They do according to their light. Why, then, should we do less than according to ours? Somebody will answer: Because they are eminently successful in carrying on their denominational work and in reaching the unsaved; and because we wish to accomplish the same ends, therefore we may safely follow their example. But let those who would consider such an answer conclusive think again.

In spite of our shortcomings, since our denominational birth, we have always held a place of leadership in the social, moral and spiritual movements for setting up the kingdom of God in this world. So advanced is our position that many of our most zealous members do not recognize our true place. They would classify certain things among us as outgrown or antiquated, but things which the Christian world is slowly approaching, and to which it will attain the sooner if we remain true to the task of leadership which the Lord has given us. We cannot continue to hold our place in the van, if we continually copy the methods and plans of those who lay behind, albeit they follow with a multitude.

In this discussion we have involved a principle which extends to much more than the mere question of whether we shall or shall not hold a conference of men. Our ideals of Church government, of the leadership of the Holy Spirit, of worship and the ministry are in danger, today, from the insidious argument that other Churches do thus and prosper, therefore we should do likewise. No amount of reiteration of Friends principles can atone for acts which, to thoughtful minds, among and around us, must appear at variance with our profession. Inevitably we show our faith by our works.

The pioneers in all departments of human life are the men and women who have a far-reaching vision and a courage peculiar to their sight. Not all have these qualifications. There are places for those who have not. They may do the Lord's work in His own way and place for them, and secure their own blessing. They may even call a conference of men, and have their reward. Our reward and blessing await faithfulness in the place to which God has assigned us.

Poughkeepsie, New York, LINDLEY M. STEVENS.
Twelfth Month 21, 1913.

[NOTE.—At no time have we advocated a conference of men Friends in order to be like some other Church, or because the Methodists had one. Our concern is that if our men would come together in the same spirit which characterized that great Methodist gathering, and face our problems with a determination to think them through, and get the inspiration which would come from large-visioned men from our own body and from other denominations, the experience would be invaluable for all our membership.—EDITOR.]

Telegram of Approval

MARSHALLTOWN, IOWA, Dec. 30, 1913.

S. Edgar Nicholson, Richmond, Ind.:

The pastors' association of Iowa Yearly Meeting, in session at Marshalltown today, gives its endorsement to the call for a gathering of the men of the Friends Church. It also unites in extending an invitation to meet in Des Moines, Iowa, on behalf of the association.

From a Letter of Approval

WILMINGTON, OHIO, Dec. 26, 1913.

S. Edgar Nicholson, Richmond, Ind.:

Dear Friend—I am for the Convention strong, even if a small number meet. It is time we were moving.

Your friend, ALBERT J. BROWN.

Letter of Disapproval

A concerned Friend's minister has written, not for publication, to protest against a conference of men, on the ground that men and women have equal standing in the denomination.

Willing to be Convinced

Another concerned Friend has written to protest against a "laymen's" meeting, but if the proposed conference is to be composed of all, ministers as well as other men, while he does not see the need of it, he is willing to be encouraged in that direction.

Another Letter of Approval

OSKALOOSA, IOWA, Dec. 18, 1913.

Dear Friend—I am writing to give my approval of the arrangement of the men's national gathering some time soon. I hope that the matter will be pushed with all vigor. If it is accomplished, Oskaloosa wants the privilege of entertaining the gathering. Placing it here would give people west of here, even those on the Pacific Coast, a little more inducement to attend, whereas, if it were at Richmond or Indianapolis, the added expense would prevent many from attending. We have ample facilities here in every way for entertaining the gathering, so that if the matter is pushed we want to be considered.

Sincerely your friend,
DAVID M. EDWARDS.

Another Endorsement

[The following is copied in part from a letter received. We omit the name of the writer, for we are not certain that she would be pleased to have it given.]

S. Edgar Nicholson:

Dear Friend—

* * * And now as to the Convention, I feel that I am one of the least to voice an opinion, but I do feel deeply on this subject. With the first mention of it I was glad. Thee certainly has the true vision. I have felt for some time, long before the Methodist Convention that that was exactly what we needed. It seems impossible to get at some of the matters which need discussion in our regular meetings. I am so often reminded after our meetings of a letter which came to me just after the close of a Yearly Meeting (not ours be it said, however), "Well, we met and threshed over the same old pile of straw." * * *

If we have the ability and capability to hold such a convention, that will prove we can still do things. Let us face our situation squarely. I have sometimes thought we are like a lot of children turned out of a country school—some are running, some jumping, some making much noise about nothing, a few walking demurely along, with none appearing to have an earnest purpose in view.

I wanted to try to say what I felt and to say "fare forth and go forward with all courage."

Current Items of Interest to Friends

CALIFORNIA YEARLY MEETING

Berkeley—We have had a very good Christmas week with good attendance, and have received two new members by request, two by letter from the M. E. Church, and two by letter from the Christian Church. These were persons who brought letters from other places, but preferred to come to us rather than their own churches here.

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING

Mt. Pleasant, Ohio—This meeting, which belongs to Van Wert circuit, has remodeled the meeting house extensively. Not only was thorough work done on the building, but new seats were put in also. The cost was $1,050.00. On December 21, the building was re-dedicated, and about $365.00 raised, which was $65.00 more than the balance of the debt. Fred Tormohlen, pastor of the Van Wert meeting, had charge of the service.

Lynn—The Christmas exercises at the Friends' Sunday-school this year were quite different from the usual. The program, "My White Gift for the King," was rendered very beautifully on Sabbath morning, making prominent the idea of giving to Christ and others, rather than looking for a gift to be received. All classes in the school fell into line, offering their gifts at the foot of a large cross on the platform. These gifts totaled: Of self to Christ, 52; of service to the church, Sunday-school and Christian Endeavor, 842; of money to Sunday-school, Home and Foreign Missions, $41.31. Two hundred and sixty were present.

One evening before Christmas about one hundred of the members of the Lynn meeting surprised their pastor, M. S. Hinckle, by going to his home with gifts and Christmas remembrances of different kinds. The evening was spent in a very pleasant way. Mr. and Mrs. Hinckle were invited to open and show to the crowd all the different gifts, after doing which both made speeches expressing sincere appreciation.

Fairmount—There was the usual large attendance at Friends' Quarterly meeting on December 20. Ellis Wells, of Upland, preached a forceful sermon from the sixth verse of the first chapter of Phillippians. He was followed by Ira C. Johnson, of Lynn. A short season of testimony followed. Mrs. Ora E. Winslow, as clerk, presided over the business session. Most of the representatives from meetings were in attendance. Fred Carter, Richard Harworth and Miss Leora Bogue had returning minutes for gospel service, the latter having done evangelistic singing in Western and New York Yearly Meetings. A satisfactory report of the Academy was given by James M. Bell, Treasurer of the Board of Trustees. The report showed the receipts were a little in excess of the expenses, which was highly satisfactory to the meeting. Ancil Ratliff gave a talk on the subject of United Missionary Work and made a plea for increased interest in sending more missionaries into the foreign field. A committee, with Hiram Harvey as Chairman, was appointed to have charge of the matter of taking over the church at East Bethel, northeast of Fairmount.

"The strongest arraignment of war ever heard in Fairmount was made Sunday morning, December 21, by ex-governor J. Frank Hanly at the Friends' Church, before an audience that packed the house. To even the Friends, one of whose cardinal principles is peace, the address was an eye-opener, so vividly were the evils of war portrayed. In graphic manner, Mr. Hanly brought up in review the vast armies slain in war, making the picture so vivid that the audience shuddered with the horror of it. In closing he made a plea for the continuation of peace principles in the United States, declaring that we had attained our high place among the nations of the world, not by force of arms or display of military power, but by the natural growth of people who have devoted their time to the development of the wonderful resources of the country. "To continue prosperous and free my country needs not armaments but a people with clean hands and pure hearts," he said in closing. The members of the Peace Committee of the Quarterly Meeting, consisting of William S. Elliott, Anna Freeman, Ed Harvey, Will Jones, Hude Dyson and Ancil Ratliff, under whose auspices the address was given, occupied seats on the platform. Ancil Ratliff introduced the speaker."—Fairmount News.

An elaborate and beautiful Christmas entertainment was given at the Fairmount Friends' Church on Sunday evening, December 21. An audience assembled that crowded the aisles and lined the sides of the church. Many were turned away who could not find entrance. There were exercises by the younger children, songs, readings and drills. The pageant was spectacular and appropriate to the season. Lady Bountiful in the person of Lucile Hiatt, after having accepted gifts from many, finally accepted Christmas, personified by little Esther Kiefer, as the greatest gift of all. A committee of five ladies had charge of the preparations.

Van Wert, Ohio—The meeting at Van Wert and the country meetings at Antioch, Mt. Pleasant and Prodigal Home are all planning to join in the simultaneous campaign, the week of January 18th, as planned by Indiana Yearly Meeting.

IOWA YEARLY MEETING

Des Moines—The Friends of Des Moines have entered heartily into the campaign against the saloon petition. Their pastor, R. R. Newby, at the morning service on December 21, gave a powerful address against it, which was listened to with interest and appreciation.

The new home for the minister at Des Moines, which was given by A. B. Elliott and wife, was completed in time for the pastor and family to move into in time to spend Christmas in their new home. Several new members were formally received into the church at the morning service on the 28th instant.

A Christmas entertainment was held at the First Friends' Church of Des Moines, on the evening of December 23d. The room was nicely decorated, and a very appropriate program was given by the small children of the Sabbath School. The entertainment was given early, upon the suggestion of the pastor, so that those who wished could spend Christmas eve at home with family associations.

Urbandale—Friends' Sabbath School at Urbandale held their Christmas exercises on Christmas night. A well filled house enjoyed the splendid program given by the children.

KANSAS YEARLY MEETING

Spring Grove—A four weeks' meeting closed at Spring Grove in Hesper Quarterly Meeting on December 7th. The services were conducted by the pastor, J. R. Perry, assisted by Walter Williams, of Emporia, and Luther Dillon as singer, from North Branch. The latter was a great help in the meeting as he sang with the Spirit. The pastor spared neither saint nor sinner. Brother Williams also preached some very helpful sermons. There were sixteen conversions or renewals, and eight united with Friends. More will join later. Many expressed themselves as being helped by the meetings. A prayer meeting has been organized.

Lane—A two weeks' meeting was recently held in an old abandoned church building at Lane, Kansas, with a large attendance. On Sabbath the M. E. pastor kindly offered their church, and both buildings were full. During the second week, Asa Dillon, from North Branch, was present, and was a great help in the services. On December 21, he preached at Spring Grove both morning and evening. Meetings are now being held at Lane every Sabbath afternoon.

WESTERN YEARLY MEETING

First Church, Indianapolis—The Christmas spirit was manifested in a variety of ways by the members of the First Friends' Sabbath School. A special collection was taken and aside from this, some of the classes distributed Christmas cheer individually. Gifts were sent to members of the Cradle Roll at the Rescue Missions, and baskets were sent to needy families.

Mooresville—Arthur Hammond, of Carmel, Indiana, closed a two weeks' meeting at Mooresville, on December 21st. It was a great uplift to many. The ministry was strong and forceful throughout all the meeting. The young people of the Church have recently organized a C. E., having at present about fifty members. On New Year's eve, while the pastor and his wife were absent from home, the Friends gathered at the parsonage, bringing with them provisions of all kinds, and carried to completion a well planned surprise.

New London—A two weeks' meeting closed December 23, at New London, Indiana. Esther Cook, of Knightstown, was the evangelist, and Leora Bogue, of Fairmount, was in charge of the singing. The teaching from day to day, was forceful and very practical. We are thankful for the visions of enlarged service given to the Church and its workers, and the encouragement the meeting was to believers. The work of Leora Bogue in the song service and her faithfulness in the meeting was much appreciated.

Albert J. Brown, of Wilmington, Ohio, returned to his former home at New London, December 12, with the remains of his father, Peyton Brown, who had passed away on the 9th. An impressive funeral service was held and his body was laid to rest in the New London cemetery.

WILMINGTON YEARLY MEETING

Ogden—A short series of revival meetings, conducted by Bertha Day, assisted by Mildred Allen, singer, was held at Ogden, Ohio, beginning December 10th. There was a large attendance and deep interest in the meetings. Thirty-two professed conversion. There will be several additions to the membership of the meeting.

EARLHAM ENDOWMENT CAMPAIGN

The Endowment Campaign carried on the past two years by Earlham College to meet an offer from the General Education Board, closed December 31, 1913. It seemed apparent some months ago that the whole $325,000 would not be secured within the time, and the efforts of the college the last few months have had the purpose of making as good a showing as possible. The total of all the gifts and pledges during the campaign approximates $134,000. A portion of this sum, however, is in the form of annuities, the face value of which will probably be discounted by the General Education Board. Thus the sum upon which they will base their pro rata gift will be smaller than the $134,000.

Of this sum $75,000 was given by M. M. White, of Cincinnati; $25,000 was secured by Morton C. Pearson during his incumbency as Endowment Secretary, and the remainder by V. D. Nicholson and others, since September, 1913.

It is hoped by the College that the General Education Board will extend the time of the contract, so that Earlham may continue on the same basis to complete the fund of $400,000 that was originally contemplated.

SIMULTANEOUS MEETINGS

As previously announced, the Evangelistic Committee of Indiana Yearly Meeting has planned for simultaneous meetings throughout the Yearly Meeting during the week of January 18th. The Committee has sent out two letters to each pastor and every local meeting is asked to participate in the campaign.

Topics with Scripture references have been suggested by the Committee, and most of the meetings are expected to follow the plans outlined. In several instances, these sessions are expected to be the beginning of a revivalistic series.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S BOARD

An important all-day session of the Young People's Board of the Five Years Meeting was held at Richmond, Indiana, on Tuesday, December 30th. Some interesting announcements about the work and prospects of the Board will be forthcoming soon.

PERSONAL MENTION

George D. Weeks has been chosen to serve the meeting at North Denver, Colorado, as pastor, until next April.

John Hadley is finding a wide field of work at Rainton, Saskatchewan. He is preaching at four stations, covering a circuit of thirty miles.

Daniel G. Hodgkin, of Manton, Michigan, has opened a series of meetings at Watseka, Illinois, Fred J. Cope, pastor. A good beginning is reported.

Levi Gregory and wife recently celebrated the fortieth anniversary of their marriage. The former is pastor of the meeting at Oakland, California.

Leanah Hobson, at last accounts, was still not well enough to leave England, although improving. She can be communicated with, care of Isaac Sharp, 136 Bishopsgate, London, E. C., England.

Morton C. Pearson, Secretary of the Indianapolis Federation of Churches, is quite active in pressing the work of the Federation. The press gives frequent accounts of his work along civic, social and religious lines.

Charles E. Tebbetts, General Secretary of the Foreign Mission Board, attended the great meeting of the Student Volunteers' Movement at Kansas City last week. "American Friend" readers may expect an interesting report of that gathering soon.

A letter from John Henry Douglas, of Whittier, California, shows that while he is feeble in health, he is still vigorous in mind and spirit, concerned, as he has been for considerably more than half a century, for the highest welfare of Friends in this country.

Prof. Allen C. Thomas, Librarian at Haverford College, and Clerk of Baltimore Yearly Meeting, is editor of the Bulletin, published by the Friends' Historical Society of Philadelphia. The current number has an article by President Sharpless on David Lloyd.

NOTICE TO MEMBERS OF INDIANA YEARLY MEETING

The copies of the London General Epistle which were ordered by the last Yearly Meeting, are now ready for distribution. Whenever pastors or other workers find they can use these to good advantage, will they kindly make an estimate of the number required and communicate with the undersigned? If these are to be used in connection with the simultaneous meetings, do not fail to order promptly.

LOVE'S MISSION

A weary man at eventide
From a day of toil returning,
Forgets his care when through the mist
He sees his home light burning.

When love has built her altar fires,
Their warm encircling light
Enfolds not only hearts at home,
But wanderers in the night.

The prodigal though faring far
With scarce a thought of turning,
Will find himself and reach his home,
If we keep the love lights burning.

NEW FEATURE OF C. E. WORK

The Friends' Christian Endeavor Society of Everett, Washington, has taken up a line of work which is proving interesting and helpful. As the result of a conversation with the Principal of the Commercial Department of the High School, a plan has been devised for co-operation between the Christian Endeavor Society and the High School concerning the need of vocational guidance for young people. The Principal, Mr. W. E. Moore, is desirous of certain information about the occupation and industries of Everett, which he was not able to get for lack of time. He especially wished to have on file data to which he could refer boys or girls who came to him for a year or two, but who could not complete the high school course of study, and his wish was to impress upon the young people's minds the fact that money and personal tasks are not all that should be taken into consideration in choosing a vocation. The Friends' C. E. Society undertook to make such investigation as would be necessary to further his work.

The following is a list of questions such as Mr. Moore sends to the Endeavor Society:

Retail Merchants—Grocerymen.

1. Qualifications.
  - a. Preparation; schooling; experience.
  - b. Personal qualities.
2. Opportunities for Right Kind of Living.
  - a. Honor and integrity.
  - b. Chances for happiness, health, etc.
  - c. Helpful member of society.
3. Opportunity for Independent Life.
  - a. Social.
  - b. Political.
  - c. Religious.
4. Chances for Financial Success.
  - a. Competition.
  - b. Credit system.
  - c. Profit on goods

5. Everett Grocerymen.

- a. Money necessary to begin business.
- b. Cost of equipment.
- c. Losses in business.
- d. Number of groceries in Everett.
- e. Salaries and qualifications of clerks.

The answers to these questions furnish the basis for informal discussion in the Endeavor meetings. In the discussion of grocery clerks, the possibility of the influence of a Christian solicitor who goes to the homes of the people, gave a very practical turn to the discussion. The first part of the hour is devoted to music, Scripture reading, prayer and singing.

To give variety to the meetings, the C. E. topic is used frequently instead of the Vocational topic, and several meetings have been devoted to the study of Quakerism.

EDWIN P. SELLEW

Edwin P. Sellew, editor and publisher of The Friend at Philadelphia, died at a hospital in that city, December 11th, following a surgical operation. For a quarter of a century he had given the best of his life to the cause of Friends, especially in his home Yearly Meeting. Following the death of the late John Dillingham, he succeeded to the editorship of The Friend, and it was his concern to bear a positive testimony to the truth, as it was given to him to see it. THE AMERICAN FRIEND bears testimony to the value of his life and Christian example, and mourns his departure in common with a host of others whose privilege it was to know him personally.

A friend of his in Philadelphia has sent us the following statement of his life and character:

"He was a Friend by conviction, having been for many years a minister among the Free Methodists. Not being satisfied with certain views and principles of this church, after study and reflection, he had adopted some tenets of the Friends before he began a correspondence, which resulted in his reception with them and his removal to Philadelphia. For a time his gift in vocal ministry appeared to lapse, but his exercise of mind and soul was most profound. When his mouth was opened to speak, at first he labored as one just beginning to proclaim the truth. As months went by his fluency and clearness of vision returned, we may say with double power, and his ministry was searching and convincing. Always in our meetings was he evidently under exercise, but he did not always speak. While his views on some matters may have appeared narrow to some, yet his winning companionship and marked ability won for him friends of every persuasion."

BIBLE SCHOOL LESSON

January 18.

Subject—The Good Samaritan.

Lesson—Luke 10: 25-37.

Golden Text—Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. Mark 12: 31.

Time—December A. D. 29, early in Christ's ministry in Perea.

Place—Northern Perea.

One is reminded of that earlier experience in the life of Jesus, when at the age of twelve years, he sat in the midst of the teachers or doctors, hearing them and asking them questions. We are wont to think of the derelicts of life and those who were in great want coming to Jesus.

But no less did he attract the rulers of the synagogue, the rich young men, chief publicans and lawyers who came to Him with many questions. Jesus proclaimed a new moral code no less than a new kind of religious life. The old law of retribution was giving place to a new law of love. The realities of living, vital truth were being incorporated into the professionalism of a Pharisaical age.

Matthew's account (Matt. 22: 35-40) and that in Mark (12: 28-31), relating experiences similar to the query of the lawyer in this lesson, emphasize the manner in which Christ had disturbed the conventionalities of that day. In each instance Jesus exalts the idea of human brotherhood in parallel terms with that of human fealty to Jehovah. The lesson of brotherliness was the hardest one for the men of that age to understand. To love one's neighbor as one's self was a far cry from the law of "an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth."

This lawyer knew the formal law. Perhaps he had it written upon his phylacteries, and he may have read it in answer to the query of Jesus. But its application in a practical sense was the revelation of unsuspected truth. To the lawyer, the "neighbor" of the Mosaic law (Lev. 19: 18) was anyone of his own set or of his own kinsmen. In this day it would be a fellow member of the same club, or of the same "social set," a cherished friend of the "sorority" or the Greek fraternity.

But Jesus improved the occasion to proclaim a paradoxical truth. Neighborliness is showing mercy to them who need mercy. The Jews had no dealings with the Samaritans, but the Samaritan was neighbor to the Jew.

An Arabian poet reproaches those who "Requite with forgiveness the wrong of those that do them wrong.

And the evil deeds of the evil they meet with kindness and love."

But what the Arabian poet considered blameworthy is shown to be the very essence of Christianity.

Note the personal touch in the story of the lesson. The Samaritan took charge of the case and gave it his personal attention. The wounded man was not turned over to the charity organization or sent to the free hospital. The road to Jericho runs by our own doors.

It is beset by dangers on every hand. They who have become the prey of evil need the touch of the Samaritan. They need human sympathy and by its application they may learn to know of that Divine sympathy which will save to the uttermost. With Paul we need to learn the art of becoming all things to all men that by all means we may save some.

Incidentally, the lesson may suggest the importance of clearing the highways of life of their robbers and their despoilers. The best act the Samaritan could have performed, were it within his power, would have been to drive the robbers from the road that led to Jericho. The ministrations of charity that relieve human suffering are to be commended, but a nobler ministry will be to make human life safe from the destroyer by making it impossible for him to find a safe habitation anywhere.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR

January 18.

Topic—Ambitious Endeavorers. II Tim. 2: 1-15. (Led by the President.)

The ideal ambition is to make a success of the Christian life. Ambition is a laudable impulse if directed toward legitimate attainments. Ambition develops an ideal and strives for its attainment.

In all too many cases, ambition is centered upon material things. The craving for office, for wealth, to be the lion of the "social set" are the standards set before every youth. Even these are not unworthy unless prostituted to base purposes.

The ambition to hold office is laudable, if the office is regarded as an important means to the end of righteous public service. The ambition to make money is praiseworthy, if the wealth is to be used for human uplift.

Few people think through to the end of things. Few have a vision beyond the ordinary. Few see beyond the sky line or live in the realm of a large faith that believes that "all things are possible."

The effort to realize the ideals of ambition is a species of faith. To attain we must avail ourselves of opportunity. To succeed we need to work as though we were masters.

Every Endeavorer should aim to help make the Society really worth while; a help to the Church, a blessing to every member, an attraction to those who are outside the ranks.

"For me to live is Christ." That was Paul's consuming ambition. What is ours? For me to live is—the theatre, or business, or pleasure, or money-making, or politics, or dress, or dancing, or display, or society. Let us put down in cold print the name of our ambition, our greatest desire."—C. E. World.

Let some member give a list of bad ambitions that are to be avoided, while another can with profit to the whole Society enumerate laudable ambitions that should be encouraged.

WHAT OUR FRIENDS SAY

The following unsolicited statements of appreciation of "The American Friend" are culled from recent letters received at our office. They could be multiplied many fold from other letters which are on file.

"I am well pleased with its present management."

"I much approve the editorials on unity and work."

"We are quite well pleased with the new American Friend."

"The paper improves constantly. I am doing all I can to put it in the homes of Friends here."

"Allow me to congratulate you upon the improvements in our paper. It is surely very gratifying to us."

"May the Lord bless thee and thy work for 'The American Friend.' I think the paper is doing a great work."

"I like it for the news; I like it for the solid, practical articles; for the excellent spirit which permeates it continually."

"I enjoyed thy editorial in the last paper very much. I told the Quarterly Meeting that the paper is getting better all the time and that they needed it, and it needed their support."

"No paper or magazine comes into my home which I believe to be more welcome and useful to us than 'The American Friend.' Every Friend's home in America should have it."

"I have enjoyed 'The American Friend' the past year, and noted its improvements from time to time. If I have enjoyed the paper, I was overjoyed at the editorial entitled 'A Year's Experiment.'"

"I feel that those of us who so strongly favored taking over 'The American Friend' and making it the organ of Friends in America, were led aright. I appreciate thy work as Editor and Manager."

"I wish to express my appreciation of the manner in which 'The American Friend' is being conducted. The policy of fairness has appealed to me, and especially the editorial in the issue of December 11th, 'The Call to a Mighty Service,' gripped me in an unusual way."

SELF DELUSION*Many People Deceived by Coffee

We like to defend our indulgencies and habits, even though we may be convinced of their actual harmfulness.

A man can convince himself that whiskey is good for him on a cold morning, or beer on a hot summer day—when he wants the whiskey or beer.

It's the same with coffee. Thousands of people suffer headache and nervousness year after year but try to persuade themselves the cause is not coffee—because they like coffee.

"While yet a child I commenced using coffee and continued it," writes a Wisconsin man, "until I was a regular coffee fiend. I drank it every morning and in consequence had a blinding headache nearly every afternoon.

"My folks thought it was coffee that ailed me, but I liked it and would not admit it was the cause of my trouble, so I stuck to coffee and the headaches stuck to me.

"Finally, the folks stopped buying coffee and brought home some Postum. They made it right (directions on pkg.) and told me to see what difference it would make with my head, and during that first week on Postum my old affliction did not bother me once. From that day to this we have used nothing but Postum in place of coffee—headaches are a thing of the past and the whole family is in fine health."

"Postum looks good, smells good, tastes good, is good, and does good to the whole body."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum now comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. Grocers sell both kinds.

"There's a Reason" for Postum

Hoskins—George F. Hoskins was born in Guilford County, North Carolina, April 2, 1835, and died at his home in Vermilion Grove, Illinois, July 27, 1913, aged 78 years 3 months and 25 days. Born of Quaker parentage, and brought up under Christian influences, he became a Christian at an early age. He was married to Rebecca Ellis in 1857. His punctuality in attending church services was proverbial, and he was faithful in prayer, testimony and personal work. He was an Elder for thirty-eight years, and was also a teacher in the Bible School. The widow and seven children survive him.

JACK FROST'S GARDEN

By Elizabeth E. Scantlebury

Oh, Jack Frost, he has gardens rare
Of roses red and lilies fair;
They grow by day, they grow by night,
Those roses red and lilies white.

On the edge of a roof that's covered with snow

You'll find his lilies in a row;
All upside down they seem to be—
But that's the way they grow, you see.

And where are Jack Frost's roses red?
Oh, they're in the funniest garden bed—
The cheeks of a little boy I know—
On them Jack's red, red roses grow!

A tiny bud is the tip of his nose,
The prickly roots are his cold, cold toes.
When the winds blow high and the sun sinks low,
How fast the lilies and roses grow!

"When They Had Prayed"

Acts 4: 13, 23-31

BY ERNEST BOURNER ALLEN

"When they had prayed"—

"The place was shaken." So, too, will any place
Where faithful hearts their wills in longing bend;
The Word with boldness will they plainly speak,
In patience serve the man that still is weak,
And wickedness its course will surely end—
When men have prayed!

When men have prayed—

The uttermost of heaven's resources wait
To shield the man beset by sin's recruits.
Up from the fray, though fierce bemaused, his eyes
He lifts to heaven! Again in faith he tries,
And God awards of righteousness the fruits—
When men have prayed!

When men have prayed—

Ah! hard the discipline, taxing oft the task!
For prayer is not the dream of leisure hours;
It has its midnight sweat, its blood-drops red,
Its hand upraised, its wine press lone to tread.
Yet reck we little when the storm-cloud lowers—
If we have prayed!

When men have prayed—

The busy course of life runs smoother on.
To fret of toil, temptations subtle test,
And all the worries which the soul attack,
Or sense of longing for the things we lack,
Are lost in heaven's benediction best—
When we have prayed!

In the World of Action

The Protestant Episcopal Commission on Faith and Order, which has been inviting the appointment of like Commissions from other denominations for the purpose of considering the question of Christian unity, has sent three distinguished members of the Presbyterian, Congregational and Disciples Commissions to Great Britain to confer with all the English Free Churches and the Presbyterian Churches of Scotland on this subject. This committee sailed on December 30th and will be gone several weeks.

There seems to be general satisfaction that the Nobel Prize Commission in Norway has decided to give the annual peace prize for 1912 to Senator and Ex-Secretary of State Elihu Root. At the same time the Commission announced that the prize for 1913 is to go to Senator Henri La Fontaine of Belgium. While Secretary of State, Mr. Root negotiated twenty-three arbitration treaties, visited all the South American States and did much to insure the reorganization of the Philippines and Cuba in a way to insure peace through order and justice. He is now President of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, while Senator La Fontaine is President of the Bureau of International Peace.

Secretary of State Bryan and the Minister of the Netherlands to this country, have signed a sweeping arbitration treaty. It provides that any question which cannot be settled by diplomacy shall be submitted to an international commission of five members. This commission shall investigate the issue in dispute during one year of time before either nation may resort to war. The life of the agreement is fixed at five years, but it remains in force until one of the contracting parties gives notice of termination.

The twenty-first annual conference of North America's evangelical foreign mission boards is in session at Garden City on Long Island, a suburban town convenient to New York. All procedure is in the form of committee reports and debates thereon. Questions that are vital to the work of foreign missions will be considered at each session. The evening of January 14th was set apart to hear a report from Dr. John R. Mott concerning his last Oriental tour. The meetings are not public, but are open only to the executive officers of the various boards.

The Attorney-General of Minnesota has decided that Bible reading in the public schools of that state is unconstitutional. A former Attorney-General has made the same ruling relative to opening the schools with prayer. Both these questions will probably be carried to the Supreme Court.

Billy Sunday is holding an eight weeks revival service in the city of Pittsburgh, with practically all the Protestant Churches backing him. The press reports are that on the second Sabbath evening he had a congregation of 20,000 persons and 5,000 more were turned away. The religious papers published in that city declare that thus early in the campaign more people are talking about religion throughout that city than has ever been known before. Many ministers who a few years ago criticised Sunday and his methods are now standing by his side, indicating the great change in public sentiment which is taking place with reference to this remarkable evangelist.

That Convention of Men

Evidences are multiplying of an increased interest in the suggested conference of the men of our Church. Several letters received at this office have given hearty approval to the proposition, although one does not agree to the proposal to have it confined to men. One suggests a modification of the idea. Others, including some of our prominent women Friends, endorse the idea fully. The proposition speaks for itself, when rightly understood, and will fall or succeed upon its merits.

Next Week

In next week's issue of THE AMERICAN FRIEND, among many other good things, will be an article by Lindley D. Clark, of Washington City, on "The Christian State"; another by Mead A. Kelsey, of Oskaloosa, Iowa, on "The Revival Most Needed." There will be others of a shorter nature of equal value on various topics. The second installment of "A Monthly Meeting Chronicle" will also appear, showing the evolutionary progression of an interesting situation, which is probably not without its counterpart in other communities. Other interesting features are in store for early numbers.

He is more than the delivering God; he is the keeping and sustaining God. He is not simply the God of the great crisis, he is the God of every day. He will provide for the journey. He will keep our feet from falling. He will impart strength according to the day. Here is the antidote for all anxiety and fear.—J. D. Jones.

The Church Must Be Efficient

One of the new elements about which we hear so much in the world's work of today is the efficiency expert. Or to be more accurate, perhaps, he should be described as an old element with a new title. We have reached an era of conservation, whether applied to forests, to coal, to water power, to government, to character, or to spiritual energy. The ability to run machinery with the least friction, to run the government with a minimum of graft and leakage, to direct the affairs of the Church with proper adjustment and with the least possible duplication of effort, to live the true Christian life among men without having the edges worn and the visage marred and the freshness dulled, these are problems to which the thinking world is applying itself as in no other age.

The world has no use for the man who cannot perform his tasks. It will ignore the organization whose energies are consumed in running its own machinery. It will repudiate a religion that shows no visible fruitage in the way of human up-lift and redemption. The need of the efficiency expert is apparent everywhere. Even the best of machinery will go awry, and in the Christian life we are commanded constantly to "watch and pray."

When Jesus cried out "It is finished," He bore testimony to the completeness with which His mission to earth had been performed. When Paul declared, "I have fought a good fight"; "I have kept the faith," he paid high tribute to the faithfulness with which he had followed in the footsteps of his Master. These lives and the lives of other men stamp indelibly for all ages the ideals of high spiritual attainment. They are the mountain peaks of human history, whose heads tower in the clear air of noble living and mighty endeavor. From the summit of achievement well performed they call to the toiling masses of earth and bid them reach out after a higher destiny.

While we are yet upon the threshold of a new year, the claims of efficiency in our lives and in the life of the Church may well be considered with earnest solicitude. The resolution to make this year count for the most in any individual experience will be disappointing in the end unless the efficiency expert is set to work upon the details of daily living, and every aspiration and action is squared by the rule of the gospel. Any purpose to make the Church or any local congregation more able to perform the tasks of community and world betterment will count for naught unless the membership, rooted and grounded in a living faith, is set to work in well adjusted relationships and with a determination to widen the scope of its activities in harmony with the larger vision of its call to service.

It is in no spirit of criticism, but with a profound concern that the best may be attained, when we say that the efficiency expert will find no easy task when he applies himself to the problems of denominational and religious efficiency. The need of such efficiency has never been greater since the dawn of history.

At a time when the whole world is open to receive the truth, we find that the reign of sin in the earth has environed so much of humanity with its veneer of unrighteousness, that the task of redemption is doubly difficult. It is a day when the cause of Christ needs to triumph in the social order, in the affairs of government, in the administration of international law, no less than in the operations of the individual life, and the call is coming as broad as the needs of humanity for the Church to reach out a helping hand wherever wrong holds sway, wherever sin has bestowed a contaminating touch.

In common vernacular, the time has come when the Church must make good its profession of missionary concern and evangelistic purposes. By the rule of introspection it needs to be able to gauge its weakness no less than to measure its power, and by the law of faith it must shake from itself every incumbrance of custom and lifeless formality, and enter upon a larger mission of human betterment, consistent with its standing as the representative of Jehovah in the earth. The Church is going forward. There is no doubt about that. But the work it must do is developing at a more rapid rate.

The soul of religious efficiency is a correct religious experience, a heart life that harmonizes with God's eternal purposes, and which provokes faithfulness in good works and the highest measure of service for the good of all. It is by such a process that the horizon of human fellowship is enlarged and the Church is re-enforced for its mighty tasks in carrying the gospel to all men.

More About that Conference of Men

It is foreign to our purpose to prolong unduly in THE AMERICAN FRIEND the discussion of the proposed conference of the men of our Church to consider some of our denominational problems. Certain objections to a conference of men having arisen seem to make a further statement necessary. THE AMERICAN FRIEND belongs to the Five Years Meeting, and if it be the consensus of opinion that no action can be taken on any question of interest to the Church that is not the product of the joint action of men and women Friends, we will bow submissively to the decree.

We cannot forbear saying, however, that we regard the objection in this particular form as wholly inapt and misdirected. The proposed conference, if held, would be entirely unofficial. It could not in the nature of things be otherwise. Its purpose would be largely inspirational, and its value would lie mainly in the fact that vital questions of denominational procedure could be squarely faced without the handicaps of official restriction. In the final analysis, any conclusions reached would of necessity come before the Church in its official capacity for adoption, modification or rejection, men and women acting together. But whatever the official action, if any, that would be the outgrowth of such a conference, the inspiration of it, if properly conducted, would probably be felt in all our activities for generations to come.

We are unable to see how the autonomy of the Church is going to be disturbed by an unofficial conference of our leading men bent upon serious business, when we have allowed, and properly so, with the consent of all, the women of the Church to band themselves together in an official capacity in behalf of the great cause of foreign missions. When they meet together as women in their triennial gathering at Muncie, Indiana, in May, in an official meeting of a well defined and fully organized Union, with the men excluded from participation, we do not imagine that the Society of Friends is going to suffer either in its spirit or in its organism. When these same women in an organized capacity became part of the Federation of all Women's Foreign Mission organizations in this country, we imagine that no one concluded that our denominational principles had been violated.

If this objection to a conference of men is to be held valid, why has not the ban been put upon Men's Organized Classes in so many of our Bible Schools? Why did we permit without a protest thousands of our Quaker men to participate in the Men and Religion Forward Movement and in the Layman's Missionary Movement?

We have a conviction that the time is past due when something should be done to stir the men of the Church to greater zeal, something that will be an invitation to win other men to join our ranks. We have before us the records of eight Yearly Meetings, which report the number of males and females, and we find that in a membership totaling 49,043, there are 4,736 more females than males. The same proportion in all the Yearly Meetings would indicate that we have on our rolls approximately 10,000 more females than males. It is certainly time that men were being called upon to do something as men, that will bind them more certainly to the Church and develop a spirit and an interest that is bound to enthuse the entire working organism of our body of believers. We cannot afford to risk the peril of bankruptcy in our Church manhood.

In such a gathering as is proposed we ought to be able to command the help and services of men of the type of J. Campbell White, Robert E. Speer, Charles Stelzle, leaders of religious thought in the world, as well as the men of our own membership who have become leaders in their particular sphere of endeavor.

In previous articles we have indicated some of the problems that we face, problems which men need to think over as men for their own good as well as the good of the entire body. It is no reflection upon our splendid women, nor to our minds is it a violation of the principles of equality in sex which the Society of Friends has always rightly maintained, to suggest the desirability of an unofficial conference of men, that they may come face to face with some of our pressing problems and put into their solution the best which our Quaker manhood is capable of giving. THE AMERICAN FRIEND can go no further than to attempt to bring the Church face to face with what we believe to be a great opportunity, and this is what we have been endeavoring to do in these discussions. What will the Church do about it?

United Mission Conferences

With the passing of the holiday season, the district conferences to promote interest in the United Mission Campaign are being resumed in various sections of the country. Every Friends meeting within the territory of these gatherings should plan to have a large delegation present, not for the sake of the conference, but for the benefit which will come to the local meeting by getting fully into the spirit of the movement. This is an interdenominational movement, but one that is designed wholly to benefit every denomination participating. Friends will miss a golden opportunity, if they do not plan to get the most out of it.

The hours and minutes of life wait upon no man's tardiness to the call of duty. The present only is vouchsafed to us. Today is the day of salvation. Now is the period for action.

To be an heir of God is to emphasize joint heirship with Jesus Christ. There is no other heritage that can compare with that of the devoted Christian.

The Evergreen Life

BY CHAS. M. WOODMAN

The day of the Christmas tree has passed, the gifts have been taken from its boughs, and the tinsel hangs limp among its branches. Interest has turned from the tree to the gifts which it carried. And yet the tree is green, and its freshness has not faded. It seemingly stands ready for another festive occasion. This is the more remarkable when we take into consideration that the tree has not only been taken away from the soil, but has been separated from its roots. It is fittingly named the evergreen tree. Let it stand for the Evergreen Life.

The need of the evergreen life is evident to all. Some Christian experiences are as fickle as the mercury in the thermometer, which on occasion all in one day will rush from midway its height to the heat that produces a thunder shower, and then as if rebounding in its reaction, it attempts a balance that will nip the buds in bloom and freeze water by the roadside. Occasionally Christian experience assumes the instability of the weathervane. Such lives are amenable, ready for service, and smiling with Christian enthusiasm this minute, and the next, if sensitive feelings have been ruffled, or the mood has changed, they shift to the stormy quarter of the compass and there is no concrete outward evidence of the Christian spirit. More often, however, Christian experience passes from the white-hot enthusiasm of its first love when it was malleable and flexible to the will of the Master, into a state of rigidity, which settles into the rut of certain well defined Christian habits good in themselves. The fires of spiritual life then burn low if they are not banked with many things that come in from the outside, banked to such an extent that there is not pressure enough on to carry any perceptible load of Christian service. Christian experience often becomes like the purchasing of an insurance policy. An effort is made to secure money to pay the premium, and then the party buying settles back in security against the day of fire or accident. It is pitiable but true that too many times Christian experience, salvation, is little other than the securing of a policy against the great day when things here on earth must be accounted for. The oaks and birches and maples and elms are all bare and bleak and empty. The cheery rustle of the leaves is gone, and the sighing and moaning of the outreaching bows is evident to every passer-by. The leaves and the green were not sturdy enough to stand the bite of the frost and the blast of the storm. They appeared but for a season and have passed away. Behold here a picture of the average life! The verdant bloom of youthful enthusiasm covers life with a mantle of beauty, but when the frosts of adversity, the chill winds of loss and disappointment, and the severe storms of disaster and heartache come upon it, the freshness disappears, the leaves wither, the enthusiasm of life gives way to the emptiness and dreariness of a too frequent cynicism and critical atmosphere which strips the life of its beauty, and it is typified by the withered autumn leaf, and the empty bough.

When the oak leaves have fallen into decay at the foot of the trees, when the maple leaves have become the prey of the fitful winds, when the birches and elms are bare and bleak, when the sombre gray of the trunks and limbs, and the brown of the withered leaves still shivering in the branches are the predominating colors, what a relief it is to the landscape to see scattered here and there the spruce, the fir and the pine, whose foliage changes not in color, but maintains the fresh green of the warm summer days. When the snow covers all the ground, and the protruding awkward trunks of the unclothed trees intensify the sterility of winter, what a relief to see the forms of the evergreens standing out in splendid contrast against the background of snowy whiteness, while their boughs bear aloft as if in triumph the masses of snow which have lodged upon them. When the freshness of life has gone and passed into the realm of dreams and memories, when the foliage of life is in the seared and withered leaf, when the vitality of life like the sap in the tree trunks has been chilled by the cold and frost of humanity's winter, when the variety of youthful enthusiasm has been transferred into the dull monotony and endless routine of the common path, when the loads of life like ice and snow upon the trees crush and break the spirit, when the fruit of life is meagre and sour and small, nipped by the frost ere it ripened, when the verdancy of life has withered, and the foliage of life in its beauty has been swept off by the storms of heartache and sorrow and disappointment and disaster, then what a relief, what a joy, what a source of comfort to find here and there in the midst of all life's emptiness and fruitlessness and bareness, the Evergreen Life whose leaf neither falls nor fades, whose verdancy is fresh and summerlike, whose limbs and trunk withstand the blight and bleak of frost and storm, and whose presence is in splendid contrast with even the average life! In a loveless world they radiate love, in a despairing world they furnish hope like the stars shining in the darkest night, in a world of doubt they hold aloft the torches of faith. Their leaf withers not and their fruit appears in its season. They are great radiant clusters of Christian vitality, of patience, joy, peace, hope, faith and love. They bear lightly and even gracefully upon their boughs the frigid, icy snows of all life's storms, troubles, responsibilities and hardships. They are not affected by life's ups and downs; they are the evergreen lives.

The secret of the evergreen life is an open secret, and has been heralded the world around for nineteen hundred years and spoken in every tongue and to every people. It is the secret of personal and living contact with the personal and living Christ. Evergreen lives are like the trees by the river, the river of God's life that flows from the Great White Throne, that finds its source in the heart of the Infinite and Eternal, and running down through the barren wastes of life's desert stretches produces along its banks the trees of the evergreen life.

There are trees whose roots grow out laterally, and gain their moisture from the surface soil. They dry up in the drought, and blow over in the storm. There are trees that sink their roots into the depths where the soil is always moist, and where the strength of the mighty earth's great embrace holds them against the storms. It is a wonderful thing to consider how just below the surface soil of life's upper strata is the great, wonderful spirit-nourishing life of God. The evergreen life is the one whose roots sink deep into the very life of God, and are held eternally in His wonderful embrace of love.

The chemistry of agriculture holds no recipe for changing a tree that sheds its leaves every year into an evergreen. But in the divine chemistry of the human spirit the secret of the evergreen tree is the secret of a changed nature, a new spirit for an old spirit, a new life for an old life, a transformed not a renovated heart. This creation of the evergreen life is the marvelous miracle of divine grace, and this evergreen life is what God has a right to expect from those who have met, have fellowshiped with, and abide in the presence of Jesus Christ.

Portland, Maine, Dec. 28, 1913.

Christianity Not Socialism

BY S. H. HODGES

The underlying principle of our present industrial system is competition. Under it the weak must necessarily "go to the wall"; and if in this life only we had hope of happiness, or, if happiness chiefly depended upon the possession of large worldly treasure, it would be a poor outlook for the incompetent. There was a time when brute force was the dominant factor in social life; and even yet, in the last analysis, this is relied upon to place the disobedient under restraint. The prison cell, or the electric chair, is the last argument of the present-day civilization. When the rewards of honesty fail to induce industry, we put the offender behind the bars of the prison.

Brute force is not now relied upon so exclusively for dishonest purposes as it used to be. Education has sharpened the intellect of the criminal in these days of advancement, so that the major part of the robbery of the country is done by educated men. Violence is vulgar. Moreover, it is dangerous and disreputable. Better results can be obtained, and respectability retained by skilful mental processes. Our laws do not, often they cannot, reach action where the actor, by superior knowledge, craft, and contrivance, has acquired the property and labor of his fellow.

I was once associated with a very wealthy manufacturer, whose factory products were in world-wide use. In conversation with him about the management of a mission, in which we were both interested, he greatly extolled the tact of one of his foremen. He said this particular foreman knew how to get a dollar's worth of work out of a man, and only pay him a half dollar for doing it. The beauty of the whole procedure lay in the transaction being done with so much "tact" that the laborer was well pleased with the result. It was the tact of the foreman in working the oracle so neatly which brought forth the commendation. Sometimes we cannot help admiring the dexterity of the pick-pocket. But to pick a pocket, however neatly the job is done, remains nothing but felony after all.

Such methods, as was commended by my wealthy friend, are being used all over Christian countries, not only on manual laborers, but also in the higher branches of mental and spiritual effort, and no human laws can reach the perpetrators. But there is a higher law which can. The "commandment of God is exceeding broad," and "the word of God is living, and active, and sharper than any two-edged sword." "There is no creature that is not manifest in his sight: but all things are naked, and laid open before the eyes of him with whom we have to do." The tact of the foreman, and the proprietor who profited thereby, will fail of commendation in "That Day."

To fully try out all human systems of government, seems to be the Providential plan. We think the purpose is to make manifest their incompetence. Autocracy has been tested and failed. Limited Monarchy was an improvement, but by no means perfectly successful. Some think Republics are no better, if so good. Poverty, misery, and wretchedness certainly abound in the United States, the biggest and best of all that have had a trial. Communism failed as early as the Apostolic age, and again in the Paris Commune. Now comes Socialism to the front for a nation-wide, and even a world-wide trial. It has given no ground for hope of success in the small field where trial has been had, and what it will be in the field in which it now aims to experiment, people who are acquainted with its minor efforts have no hesitation in fore-telling.

Every cult that has arisen in religions and reformations has some one distinguishing feature, which is the raison d'être of its existence. That of Socialism is the destruction of individual ownership of property. In its place collective ownership is to be established. Limitations are set up by some. Others would ask at once for unlimited government ownership and control of all utilities. Individual ownership of any thing is impossible to an honest and logical Socialist.

There are two unconquerable obstacles to the success of Socialism: (1) The innate, inordinate selfishness of unsaved mankind; (2) the absence of any adequate incentive to excellence under a universal, collective, impersonal ownership of all property. A motive beyond a mere existence is necessary to stimulate to effective action in the conquest of the obstacles which are in the way of progress. The absence of any such motive is enough to insure the failure of the system; and a universal deterioration of the race would probably follow the practice of Socialism in any world-wide degree. A recent writer has said in regard to this idea, "the principle that an infinitely helpful society can be produced by setting up a row of in-infinitely helpless individuals, is Socialism." The absurdity is apparent.

In some quarters there has been persistent attempt to represent Jesus Christ as a Socialist in principle. Professor Huron, said to be the inspiring and guiding genius of the international social movement, is endeavoring to give Socialism a religious aspect. "Is it not time," he asks, "that Socialism have its more mystical presentment?" Socialism, he says, must become a religion if it is to revolutionize and reorganize the world. The achievement of social unity, he sets forth as being that for which humanity has striven, and he calls this "The Great Hope." Christianity, he claims, is one of the most notable expressions of this hope. Thus he endeavors to bring the Christian system into line with Socialism, and incidentally with most of the other religions of the world.

This is another instance of the superficial character of the conception formed of Christianity, by the unsaved scientific men of the day. The achievement of social unity may be a great hope in the estimation of Professor Huron, but it never was, and is not now "THE Christian hope." Probably the professor has read enough of the Scriptures to know that Jesus prayed that His disciples might be one and that their love for each other might be as his love for them, even to the point of laying down their lives, the one for the other. This same idea runs through the Epistles; but there is nothing in this, or any other Scriptures, about the destruction of individual ownership of property, or the collective, or governmental ownership of the same. On the contrary, through the whole Christian system benevolence is inculcated, which is quite impossible if nobody owns anything.

The one all-important hope, set before the followers of Christ, was the realization of a perfect subjective kingdom of righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Ghost in this life, which should qualify for the resurrection, and an entrance into the "Glorious kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ," in the life to come. The possession here, in its relative perfection, was, in the days of the Apostles and is now in our day, considered and said to be the earnest of the glory then to be possessed and enjoyed. Hence the hope held up to the suffering ones. The perfection of love, which would cast out all fear, and remove the doubts and uncertainties of religious life here, was the earthly goal; while life with an incompatible resurrection body in the external or objective kingdom hereafter was the heavenly expectation, which buoyed up the soul in the midst of persecution and martyrdom. Anything less harmonious with Socialism could hardly be conceived.

Now, while godliness is, as Paul said, "profitable for the life that now is, and for that which is to come," it is nevertheless true that eternity and its joys in useful service looms up before the Christian as the absorbing factor in his prospective. Especially is this the case as the margin between life and death diminishes. True Christianity is based on individual ownership of property and experience, but associating in church organization for the bringing in of the Kingdom of God. "Work of faith, labor of love, and patience of hope" are its characteristics manifested in this life, and no doubt will also be the same in the next.

The professor speaks of Jesus having made "proposals the most revolutionary that men had ever heard then, or that they have heard since; and because of these proposals He was put to death." "His peace and good-will were to proceed through a conclusive destruction of the powers and customs, national and individual, built upon tyranny and ill-will."

To those who have no real or only a superficial knowledge of the teaching and method of Jesus Christ, this might sound somewhat in harmony with the utterances of the Lord. But to those who know the voice of the Shepherd it will be strange indeed. To whom did Jesus ever make a proposal? He spake as never man spake. The authority of His utterances was always in evidence. He gave some invitations, but made no proposals. "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly of heart, and ye shall find rest to your souls," is His standard invitation. He made declaration quite the contrary to that asserted of Him by the professor. It was that He came not to destroy the law or the prophets, but to fulfill; and the law ever contemplated individual ownership of property, and in no one of the prophets can other teaching be found. Jesus avoided every semblance of interference with ownership of property, and when asked to do so, He resented the application, rebuking the applicant. Had His mission been that of a political reformer, there was abundant opportunity for His effort in that direction. His aim was far different. He sought to effect improvement by striking at the root of evil; that is, by changing the heart of the individual, well knowing that when the source is pure the stream will be pure also, and that no amount of outward application will ever effect the desired result.

Work

We have been organizing and making machines for several years past, and but little work has been done. The imperative call now is for work. For forty years we worked and many were saved and added to the Church, and many new Churches were organized. A change has come over us; we have slowed down until we are running behind in numbers. We never have had as many appliances as now, and the door is open for us all over the world.

Let us at once find the essential equipment, the baptism with the Holy Ghost with the endowment of power. Let evangelical truth be proclaimed and the evangelistic appeals be made in a way to lead to Christ. The gospel is the power of God unto salvation to everyone that believes. Let the supernatural be felt above all professional or ritualistic performances. Let the Holy Spirit have the right of way. Let self-sacrificing interest characterize our appeals publicly and privately. To win a soul is most delicate work, and requires great care and watchfulness on the part of the worker. Let our papers be filled with evangelical truth, with evangelistic effort, and with the reports of the work from our entire field. But little beside this need be published for the next six months.

The spirit which manifested itself in Wilmington Yearly Meeting, when they prayed for one thousand souls for this year, appeals to me. I notice a like spirit in Western and Indiana Yearly Meetings, and I suppose it was felt in some of the other meetings.

May the Lord bless all the provisions of Zion. Our Training Schools should have our earnest prayers and sympathy. And may this travail for souls become deep and painful, that children may be brought forth in the near future.

My work is about finished, but my interest in soul saving is greater than ever before. I do praise God for the faithful pastors who through these years of drouth have stood faithfully caring for the flocks committed to their care. May they be rewarded abundantly by seeing a large ingathering of souls. And may every member of the Church come up to the help of the Lord against the mighty.

• A Monthly Meeting Chronicle

BY JUNIUS JUNIOR

(Wherein is told the story of a Monthly Meeting which caught a vision, and with some misgivings decided to improve an opportunity.)

I.

"At Slow Valley Monthly Meeting of Friends, held at Newtown, Seventh-day morning, First month 11, 1913." Thus read the clerk in breaking the silence of the period of worship in this first session of the Monthly Meeting in the new year. It was the stereotyped opening minute which had been read twelve times a year for forty-two years, and that many times had marked the transition to the congregational meeting wherein was transacted the formal business of the Church.

A forty-minute devotional period preceding had included two prayers, a song and the usual Monthly Meeting discourse, which upon this particular occasion took on some added life by the exhortation to the small company gathered to live better during the coming year than they had done in the year that had become history. Eleven elderly men, twenty-one elderly women, three young women, a young man and four children constituted the assembled congregation.

After the minutes of the previous meeting had been read and approved, the annual reports of the various committees were presented in routine order by the clerk. The Bible School Committee reported that the School had met regularly each Sabbath during the year with about the usual interest being manifested. Only one man present expressed any concern over the fact that the average attendance was lower by six than during the previous year.

The Committee on Foreign Missions reported that efforts had been made to keep up the contributions to the standard of 1912, but to the regret of all there was a falling off of $13.79. The membership was exhorted to do their best for the heathen across the seas, and two women expressed their regret at the decline in the offerings. It was explained, however, in a satisfactory way that times had been hard and that one family had moved away, and two which had been active in the work now only came occasionally.

With this explanation, the clerk read the temperance report, followed by the report on peace, and the others in order.

The communication on the state of the Church was brief, stating the belief that spiritual interest was being maintained, while deploring the fact that many did not come to meeting, and that the young people were strangely negligent. Several, including the pastor, made remarks in a somewhat apologetic vein, and the meeting passed on to the report of the treasurer. This was a model of preciseness and a number expressed their satisfaction at the careful way in which the financial records were kept.

In addition to the falling off in foreign mission contributions previously noted, it was shown that there was a deficit in Yearly Meeting stock of $14.85 and of Monthly Meeting stock for current expenses of $18.70. A delinquency in the pastor's salary of $26.50 was also noted. Seven of the men expressed concern over the situation and one of them proposed that they ask the Quarterly Meeting to petition the Yearly Meeting for a reduction in appropriations, because of the prevailing hard times and the drouth of the past summer. This was united with, and a minute to that effect was recorded.

A request from the United Charity organizations of the little city for help in taking care of the needy poor was the subject of some animated discussion, which finally resulted in passing the hat, from which was taken $2.17 for this worthy purpose. A letter was read from the manager of a new mission which had recently been started in the newly developed foreign quarter of the growing little city, appealing for co-operation and financial assistance, but after some remarks, the clerk was directed to send a reply explaining that owing to the hard times the meeting did not see its way clear to render any help at this time, but expressing the hope that the mission would be instrumental in winning many souls into the Kingdom.

The meeting seemed about ready for the concluding formalities, when a retired farmer arose and prophesied that the financial stringency would continue for another year, and said there was no telling but that another spring flood and a subsequent summer drouth would be visited upon them. He encouraged the committees to curtail their expenditures and finally expressed the opinion that the Five Years Meeting ought to be done away with, because it was proving altogether too costly. Two other men united with the remarks and the meeting was apparently ready to close with a satisfied feeling that perhaps the congregation could just about hold its own for another year.

The clerk had arisen to read the concluding minute, when a modest merchant of the town arose, a newcomer to the community, and said he was not quite satisfied for the meeting to adjourn without a few remarks. With some apparent embarrassment, and considerable hesitation, he ventured to suggest that conditions in the meeting were not at all satisfactory. To him the reports for the most part had been discouraging, while the presence in a congregational meeting of only forty out of a total membership of 173 was not indicative of the proper spiritual interest. He was not satisfied with the reply which the meeting had directed the clerk to send to the new city mission, and he felt that there was much work in the city and the country community adjoining it which ought to be done, with nobody apparently looking after it.

To his mind the financial deficiencies were indicative of a wrong situation somewhere in the meeting which ought to be remedied. His remarks fell upon the little company with apparent surprise, and several, including the retired farmer, were quick to defend the action already taken, and suggested that they had better adjourn. The pastor, visibly embarrassed over the implied criticisms of the business man, in a disconnected talk, expressed the wish that conditions were different, but, upon seeing the determined look of the retired farmer, concluded with the remark that he thought the meeting was about up to the average.

The clerk hastily read the concluding minute, when two of the men and three of the women hastened to assure their business friend of their sympathy with his remarks, upon which he indicated that perhaps a month hence he would have further to say on the subject.

The Student Volunteer Convention

Those who attended the quadrennial convention of the Student Volunteer Movement, at Kansas City, December 31 to January 4, were aware that it marked an epoch in world history. It was not the mere fact that five thousand persons had come together for a common purpose that made the gathering significant. It was the class of persons who came, and it was the definite purpose for which they had come. They were young persons, college students, Christian college students, leaders who were selected with the view of the possibilities of their student influence. The object of the meeting was more definite than merely a missionary convention. It was to help those thousands of young men and women to answer the question, "What is my part, as a follower of Jesus Christ, in making Him known to all the world?"

Delegates were present from practically every college, university, medical school, and theological seminary in the country. Most of the prominent foreign countries were represented with native student delegates. There were about 200 Chinese and Japanese delegates. Some 500 representatives from the Layman's Missionary Movement were there.

The convention organization, effected by the chairman, John R. Mott, and his associates, was most wonderful. Every detail had been looked after with great exactness. At the appointed minute for the opening session of the convention, the chairman lifted the gavel, and in two minutes it was moving along smoothly.

A complete list of the speakers of the convention would be voluminous. They were of the very first rank in ability. They were both thinkers and orators in the broadest sense of these terms. In their selection it was evident one requirement was made fundamental. No person had any part on the program unless he was known to be of unequivocal Christian character. Every man had a message to impart. For twenty years John R. Mott and Robert E. Speer have jointly occupied a place of unique influence among the college students of North America. Both of them were frequently heard during the sessions. Ross Stevenson, of Baltimore; President McKenzie, of Hartford; Sherwood Eddy; Campbell White; Editor McDonald, of Toronto; Commissioner McFarland, of Washington; R. F. Horton, of London; and Secretary Bryan, indicate the rank of the convention speakers.

William Jennings Bryan was easily the convention speaker who aroused most popular enthusiasm. One rule of the convention was that there should be no applause. This rule was violated just once; that was when Mr. Bryan came onto the platform. Chairman Mott introduced the secretary with words that were classical in their appropriateness, comprehensiveness and beauty, closing with "We now rise to greet the Secretary of State of the United States of America." It was a moment of intense feeling. Eight thousand people rose to their feet instantly. Yet not a handclap sounded, nor was a voice heard. The enthusiasm was the more powerful because pent up. His address was simple, and not new. He urged foreign missions as an aid in diplomacy. He defended Christianity against atheism. He advocated less money for war ships, and more to promote international good feeling.

At one of the evening sessions subscriptions were received for the promotion of the Student Volunteer Movement. In a few minutes cards were returned showing total subscriptions of $112,000. This amount was considerably increased before the close of the convention.

The report of the chairman showed that "within the lifetime of the movement, 5,882 of its members have sailed. They have gone out to the foreign field under the auspices of over seventy missionary agencies, practically all being connected with the recognized missionary societies." "During the four years which have elapsed since the Rochester Convention 1,466 volunteers have sailed. The opening sentence of Mr. Mott's quadrennial report describes one's feeling in witnessing this convention from the side lines: 'It is a holy sight,' said Disreali, 'to see a nation saved by its youth.' Is it not a more inspiring sight to see the students of the North American continent dedicating themselves to the sublime undertaking of making Jesus Christ known, loved and obeyed through the entire non-Christian world?"

ARTHUR JONES.

SIMULTANEOUS MEETINGS

As previously announced, every local meeting in Indiana Yearly Meeting is asked to hold services daily from January 18 to 25, inclusive. The following letter has been sent out by the Evangelistic Committee suggesting daily topics for consideration:

Dear Friend—The Evangelistic, Pastoral and Church Extension Committee as suggested in a letter sent out in November in regard to the simultaneous meetings to be held January 18 to 25, inclusive, 1914, now offers the following suggestions:

1. Please report the results of the meetings to the Superintendent as soon as convenient after their close.

2. Above all things make evangelism the keynote of the week's work. It is hoped that the interest may be such that the meetings will be held longer than one week. It is understood that this plan is only suggestive and is to be carried out in each meeting only as far as may seem best.

EARLHAM GOSPEL TEAM

The Earlham College Gospel team held a successful series of evangelistic meetings at Spiceland, Indiana, during the holidays. The team was composed as follows: Horace Reed, Howard McMinn, Harold Rogers, Roscoe Williams, Charles Semler, Cyrus Lancaster, Benjamin N. Johnson, Everett Davis and Josiah Marvel. We copy the following concerning their work from a letter to President Kelly, written by Homer H. Cooper, Superintendent of Spiceland Academy:

"Spiceland has been glad to welcome these boys in school, church and home. Their labor has not been in vain. The students of the Academy will live cleaner, more serviceable lives because they have been associating intimately with those whose daily life was a sermon on the essential principles of the Christian religion. The Church has already felt their influence in an increased membership. The boys have been an inspiration to the young men of the Academy, and to the young and to the old of the community. Because of their gentlemanly conduct they have been doubly welcome in our homes. Earlham should feel proud of these boys—we are.

"You will remember that Shakespeare says of Brutus, 'Nature might stand up and say to all the world, This was a man.' Let me suggest that in the same way all Earlham stand up and say of these boys, 'They are Christian men.' In behalf of Spiceland Academy, and personally, I thank these boys most sincerely and, I will add, God bless them—every one."

THANKS FOR CONTRIBUTIONS

The following amounts were given by Bible Schools of Indiana Yearly Meeting toward the new Meeting house at Anderson, Indiana. We take this opportunity to thank these schools for their generous offerings:

BALTIMORE YEARLY MEETING

Washington, D. C. — Baltimore Quarterly Meeting was held at Washington City last Saturday and Sunday, the 10th and 11th. On Saturday evening there was a conference on "Missionary Work in Syria, with Some Experiences in the Balkan War," addressed by Daniel Oliver, of England.

CANADA YEARLY MEETING

Swarthmore — The Friends' Meeting at Swarthmore, Saskatchewan, is in a prosperous condition. With the new families that have moved in during the year, and with Aaron McKinney as pastor, the outlook is bright. Through the efforts of Ernest Howard, and the advertisements in The American Friend during the past year, 1,760 acres of land have been sold here. These farms have all been bought by Friends with the exception of 320 acres, bought by a Methodist family. We are expecting a large immigration of Friends in the spring. The winter thus far has been ideal. There has been no snow and very little zero weather.

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING

Dublin — The Bible School at Dublin has adopted the graded lessons for the three lower classes. They were first tried on January 4th.

Spiceland — A company of young men from Earlham College known as the "College Gospel Team," sent a message to the Friends of Spiceland expressing a desire to come and hold some religious meetings in our midst, thus spending a part of their holiday vacation in work for the Master. Friends here were willing and glad to accept their services, and freely opened their homes for entertainment. They began meetings on December 29, which were held each evening for seven days. Through the day, meetings were held for men and boys, and a service each day with the Academy students. We are glad these Christian young men felt the call to come to us with the message of salvation. The life of Christ was an especial theme with them, and the importance of taking Him as a pattern for our daily lives. The meetings closed Sabbath evening, January 4th, with a large, enthusiastic audience.

IOWA YEARLY MEETING

Des Moines — The Christian Endeavor Society of Des Moines Meeting has organized a round table study class. Mrs.

M. Emma Newby is the teacher and each consecration meeting they have a lesson from "The Story of Quakerism."

There has been an extra movement in the Des Moines W. F. M. S. to awaken a greater interest in Home Missions. They are taking up the study of the book "Mormanism," besides other phases of home missionary work.

KANSAS YEARLY MEETING

Kansas City, Missouri — A reception and supper was given by the local Christian Endeavor Society, in Kansas City, for delegates from Friends' colleges, and other Friends in attendance at the Student Volunteers' Convention. The reception was held at the Friends' Church between the afternoon and evening sessions, Thursday evening, January 1st. Sixty-five were present from outside Kansas City. They registered from seventeen institutions of learning.

Friday afternoon the Friends' delegates met at the Friends' Church for the denominational meeting. Charles E. Tebbetts had charge of the meeting. Arthur and Edna Chilson, and Jefferson C. Ford were missionaries present. There were eighteen student volunteers at the meeting.

On Sabbath morning, January 4th, Charles E. Tebbetts preached at the Friends' Church. Four student volunteers gave personal testimonies of the influences that led them to consecrate themselves to the work of foreign missions. Sabbath evening Jefferson C. Ford spoke, and told of his work in Jamaica and Africa.

NEW ENGLAND YEARLY MEETING

Newport, Rhode Island — Daniel Whybrew, of Lupton, Michigan, closed a series of meetings here on January 4. From the first the Lord's presence was remarkably manifested. Many souls found the Lord in pardon and purity. Some of our delinquent members were revived, especially younger members. Among the seekers were many in United States Navy uniform. It was a beautiful sight to see so many men at one time earnestly praying and seeking deliverance from sin.

West Falmouth, Massachusetts — The meeting at West Falmouth, Massachusetts, begins the year 1914 well organized in all departments for efficient work. The Sabbath meetings are felt to be times of special favor and blessing from the Lord. The voice of prayer and praise is often heard. Our last Monthly Meeting adjourned to meet at 7:00 o'clock in the evening, instead of 2:00 p. m., that our business men may have the opportunity to attend without interfering with other engagements. The Christian Endeavor recently reorganized, with Marion Atwood as President. All the other officers and different committees were chosen. The C. E. meetings are well attended and much interest shown. All our young people in the church are taking an active part. In the reorganization of the Sunday-school, the services of Mrs. Arnold Gifford as Superintendent, received emphatic approval by her unanimous re-election. The presentation of a beautiful silk-sewed, limp covered Schofield Bible was an expression of appreciation of her faithful and very successful service the past year.

The Christmas exercises of the Sunday-school were held at the church on the evening of December 21. Recitations by the primary and junior classes, also story telling by the members of the adult classes were much enjoyed. Mrs. M. O. Swift related that old story of "The other wise man." Mrs. Gifford explained the "White Christmas," a form of exercise now in use in many Sunday-schools of today. The Christmas spirit prevailed throughout the entire audience, even the youngest member of the cradle roll seemed filled with it. Appropriate songs were given by the chorus, and instrumental selections were rendered by members of the Christian Endeavor. The pastor, W. Jasper Hadley, gave a very interesting account of Christmas with the Indians, amongst whom he and Mrs. Hadley labored for more than five years. The evening closed with singing and the Mizpah benediction.

The Sabbath-school and C. E. joined in a union holiday social on the evening of December 29th at the hospitable home of Samuel Wilmore, and spent a very pleasant and profitable hour. Music, games and social chat were indulged in, as well as the distribution of gifts to each one present. After light refreshments were served and goodbyes said, all returned to their homes feeling better equipped for the year's work, knowing each other better. Harmony prevails throughout the church, and we enter the New Year ready to do aggressive work. Our watchword is "Forward."

NEW YORK YEARLY MEETING

Poplar Ridge—Scipio Quarterly Meeting was held January 9-11. On Friday afternoon at the meeting on Ministry and Oversight, the subject for discussion was "The Relation of the Non-Resident Members to the Church." In the evening there was an address on "The Crisis Confronting the Christian Church; I. At Home," by John R. Walter, of Poplar Ridge. On Saturday evening there was an address on the second part of the same subject, "Abroad," by Ida T. Parker, of Union Springs. On Sabbath evening there was a gospel meeting in charge of Ida T. Parker.

NORTH CAROLINA YEARLY MEETING

Harmony Grove—A very successful series of meetings was held at Harmony Grove beginning November 12, 1913, lasting eight days. In all, there were sixty-seven conversions and renewals, and there were thirty-three accessions to the church, and a great awakening among the entire membership. The meetings were held by Wade H. Adams and Franklin Warden. This Meeting is within one mile of Yadkinville, and the greater part of the conversions were boys and girls in school at that place.

Yadkinville—On the first Sabbath in December, Wade H. Adams and others began a meeting in the Court House in Yadkinville, lasting fifteen days. This meeting was a success from the beginning. First reaching the leading business men, the Holy Spirit with power of conviction settled down upon the town in such measure that strong men and women were made to quake and tremble as they came into the meeting. The community was stirred as never before, and there were but few left in town that did not yield to the call of the Spirit. In all, there were one hundred and seventeen conversions and renewals. The gospel was preached in its simplicity and with power.

Winston-Salem—George N. Hartley was with us in the month of November and held an eight days' meeting. His ministry was sound, clear and convincing. We believe some were helped to a better life. His visit among Friends here was much appreciated. He also gave two lectures on "Bible Lands," which were much enjoyed. He left here for other points in the state.

OHIO YEARLY MEETING

Long Run—A series of meetings was begun at Long Run Church December 7, 1913, by the pastor and Isaac L. Kinsey, and continued without missing a day until the evening of the 30th. Brother Kinsey was wonderfully blessed of the Lord in his preaching and the power of conviction was manifest from the beginning. In all, eighty-five people knelt at the altar and claimed conversion or renewal. Forty-four requests for membership have been made and more will probably come.

I think this Meeting has never been described in The American Friend. It is located two and one-half miles west of Mt. Pleasant, Ohio, and between the mining towns of Ramsey and Long Run. Our house was built several years ago as a mission point of Mt. Pleasant Meeting, and some great meetings were held here by Lewis I. Hadley and others in its early history. But interest had waned, many had moved away, and when the present pastor moved into the vicinity three years ago, there was a small Sabbath School with only one professing Christian. There was a mining population of perhaps one thousand people within a mile of the building, who were a mixture of Poles, Hungarians, Italians, Russians, English, Scotch, Irish, Americans, etc., with all the booze and vice of general mining towns. The work has been growing slowly. There have been no funds for pastoral or evangelistic support, so that much that would have been helpful has had to be left undone.

In March, 1912, Brother Kinsey helped us with a revival, and about twenty-five members were received. The following June a preparative meeting with thirty-two members was organized. Last winter Brother Kinsey was with us again, and a few more faithful workers were added. Last fall we began planning and praying early for a great revival. Cottage prayer meetings were held in many homes and a large proportion of the membership were fully prepared for a revival when meetings began, and God answered our prayers above our anticipation.

A new Sabbath School was organized by some of our members at Herrick, another mining town three miles from us, in November, and they are wanting a series of meetings there, which will probably be held beginning about the 18th instant.

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING

Haverford—The address at the second Tea Meeting of the year was given by Samuel Zane Batten, who heads the Social Service Commission of the Baptist Church of America. He brought a very forceful message, basing his remarks on Matthew 18. Dr. Batten said that crime, poverty and misery are of human origin, that they are not part of God's plan for a life. Every man has the same natural capacities, but too many lack opportunity. The waste of child life, a direct loss to humanity and to God, is enormous. Such evils are social evils and can be successfully dealt with only by social effort.

Dr. Baker's class of the Sunday-school occupies quite a unique position in this locality. Its membership includes some forty or more active men and women from almost every denomination. The class hour affords excellent opportunity for the free interchange of views. Recently the class hour was spent in a discussion of "The Inside of the Cup." "The Gospel of the Kingdom" studies is the course adopted for this year's work.

The Christmas exercise of the Sunday-school consisted of songs and texts furnished by the primary and intermediate departments. Rufus M. Jones and Anna R. Ladd gave short interesting talks. The school made up eighteen baskets of food containing such articles as a turkey, cereal, potatoes, tea, sugar and fruit for distribution among needy people of the neighborhood. Toys were sent in to the children's ward of one of the city hospitals.

Rufus M. Jones brought an inspiring New Year's message at meeting January 4th. Reviewing briefly our past, he urged us to take on more of the spirit and to go forward in a useful and serviceable career as a church.

WESTERN YEARLY MEETING

Bloomington—Mary Pickett, who for months has been in the war scourged portion of Mexico, reached her home here on New Year's Day. She is accompanied by a young Mexican girl. She will remain until it is regarded safe for the school at Victoria to reopen.

Azalia—Charles Axton, of Kokomo, Indiana, held a very interesting and valuable series of meetings at Azalia recently. He handles the Scriptures dextrously, and is strong, clear and convincing in his presentation of truth.

Vermilion Grove, Illinois—Following an all-day meeting on Thanksgiving Day, the pastors, Carl F. and Minnie G. Miller, started our revival meeting. On December 1st they were joined by Fred Carter, of Jonesboro, Indiana. For two weeks Brother Carter very faithfully preached the full gospel to a needy people. God honored his work and gave souls for his hire. There were thirty-eight in all converted and renewed. A children's meeting held on Sabbath afternoon resulted in eleven conversions. We give God the glory.

BIBLE SCHOOL LESSON

January 25.

Subject—Serving Jesus.

Lesson—Luke 8: 1-3; 9: 57-62; 10: 38-42.

Golden Text—Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of these my brethren, even these least, ye did it unto me. Matt. 25: 40.

Human nature stories that tell of sacrifice and devotion are always of commanding interest. They will take hold of men when cold logic or reason are barren of results. Here the International Committee has taken three accounts that are widely separated as to time and place, to emphasize the single idea of service.

But service is so varied. He who gives the cup of cold water serves in his sphere no less effectively than the body guard of royalty, or the man in high official position. Loyalty, obedience, faithfulness, impulsiveness, affection are all depicted in the incidents of the lesson, and from three angles we read the lessons of devotion that are the essence of Christian service.

Part I

Luke 8: 1-3. Jesus had gone out from Capernaum and was on a tour of the numerous villages that thronged the hills and valleys of Gallilee. He was out with his disciples on a missionary journey in the effort literally to reach the multitudes. His Kingdom on earth was in process of development, and there was good news to be proclaimed to everybody.

His preaching was in parables so that the common folk could understand. But a journey of such a company must have material backing. There must be financial support. There must be daily assistance as well as encouragement. Along with Jesus and his chosen assistants went a company of women who ministered to their comforts and necessities, women who had been healed of maladies and ailments and who were bound to the new cause by the strongest ties of obligation and interest. Those who had been forgiven much could love most, and their devotion was a model for all the centuries.

Who can doubt the efficacy of the faithful ministrations of these women in contributing to the success of these little missionary marches?

Part II

9: 57-62. A year perhaps has elapsed since the preceding event. An impulsive scribe (Matt. 8: 19) declares his purpose to go with Jesus to the end. Probably he had the common vision of an earthly kingdom and was laying the wires for promotion later on. But no matter what the future had in store his impulse now was to proclaim undying fealty to the Master.

But Jesus puts this fealty to the severest test, and reminds the scribe that there is no prospect of earthly promotion, for the leader has not even a home to call his own. Perhaps the scribe had counted the cost. Perhaps the impulse was momentary. But Jesus took no unfair advantages. He wanted men to see where their paths would lead.

To another man, one of the disciples who hesitates about immediate service, Jesus teaches a practical lesson, that the faithful servant must leave all to proclaim abroad the interests of the Kingdom.

To still another he shows the danger of irresolution. Spending a few days at home might dull the urgency of the call to service with the Master. There was the possibility that the call of old associates would prove the stronger call. When the Master bids to go it is time to obey. No question of pleasure, or expediency, or convenience, or of family ties can outweigh the immediate urgency of duty.

Part III

10: 38-42. This is a lesson of affection mingled with service in home life. Jesus had gone to Bethany and as was his custom went into the home of Martha and Mary. Two sisters, opposite in temperament, are entertaining him. Martha is the work woman "cumbered about with much serving," her nerves on edge, striving to do her best for the welcome guest, but impatient at the sister who has forgotten household duties in listening to the gracious words of the Master.

How realistic the scene! Both are types that appear in many a home. Martha's impatience can no longer be restrained, and she appeals to the guest to bid her sister turn to the preparation of the meal. How gentle and how tactful is the reply! Martha, thou art troubled and a bit over-anxious. There is something besides household cares. Mary's interest in things eternal is not to be rebuked, for they constitute the "better part." "Seek ye first his kingdom, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you."

Herein is portrayed the varied effects of Christ's teaching upon the people. He had the power to make men and women want to render him some service. It was the compulsion of love. He that was faithful in the little would ere long be made ruler over more. The little tasks of life become great when they are the faithful ministrations of consecrated, devoted men and women, seeking to promote the interests of the Kingdom of God. "Obedience is better than sacrifice," and service is the fruit of love.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR

January 25.

Topic—The Perils that Threaten our Nation. Jer. 22: 1-5, 13-18. (Home Mission Meeting.)

1. Unfaithfulness to God and insincerity of purpose. How many there are who live selfishly and then hope to die righteously! If humanity could only be as much in earnest about religion as it is about material prosperity, the Nation would be safer.

2. Infidelity. The community that is least religious is the most dangerous. The neighborhood without a church and without the Bible most easily becomes the servant of evil in the state and in the Nation. Godless lives which doubt God's truth can form no pillars of support for a progressive and beneficent people.

3. Loose Home Life. Looseness in the home means looseness in the state. Any delinquency around the family hearthstone will find its counterpart in public duties. One of the bulwarks of our national life is correct home life. What a responsibility rests upon parents and children, who owe it not only to themselves but to others to follow the best ideals in their everyday living.

4. Municipal Rule. The problem of popular sovereignty in our cities is still in the solving. There lurk mainly the perils of the Nation. There sin and graft and impurity of every kind mass their forces, and persist in trying to hold the reins of government. Our cities need to be evangelized and purified, not only for their own sake, but for the sake of the state and republic of which they are such a material part. Municipal government in our cities is one of our greatest problems in the solution of which virile Christianity must play a leading part.

5. The Saloon. The government has no enemy more deadly than the liquor traffic, although it is more than ready to pay homage—taxes—for the sake of being allowed to live. The saloon is the soul of dishonor and impurity and disloyalty. It will observe no law it is not compelled to keep. It will debauch the fairest and the best for the sake of gain. The traffic in rum must be destroyed and its overthrow is overdue.

6. Impurity and Vice. No nation can thrive upon the shame of its people. Virtue is our nation's defense. It must be maintained at all hazards, and he who temporizes is an enemy of the public good.

7. Lawlessness. Politics has all too often been a poor schoolmaster, in that it has taught offenders of the law that government is too hypocritical to enforce its own decrees. We need a revival of law observance and law enforcement for the safety of our government.

8. The Problem of Immigration. Unchristianized masses are a peril to any government. The Church must take hold of the problems of the immigrant as it has not yet done, and thus prepare our cosmopolitan citizenship for proper assimilation into a Christian social order and a model state.

Other perils will suggest themselves to the thinking young people.

CANADIAN LANDS

Friends desiring to move to Canada will do well to correspond with Ernest Howard, Adanac, Sask., who has spent nine years in different parts of Saskatchewan and Alberta. I have gone through the pioneer life of homesteading and can give a few points on homesteading that will save money and many privations. I have several well improved farms near school and Friends' Church, which I can sell very reasonable and on easy terms. Good opening for a small colony of about six families. Rural telephone and mail route as soon as spring opens up, will go through the neighborhood. Descriptive pamphlet of Friends' Colony at Swarthmore, Sask., will be sent to any address. For further information correspond with ERNEST HOWARD, Adanac, Sask., Canada.

PERSONAL MENTION

Mary E. White is being supported by the Friends of Lynnville, Iowa, as pastor of a meeting in Jamaica.

Dr. David W. Dennis, of Richmond, spent the holidays in Washington City, and attended the Washington City Meeting.

Prof. Harlow Lindley, Professor of History in Earlham College, attended a meeting of the National Historical Society at Charleston, South Carolina, during the holidays.

Max I. Reich, of London Yearly Meeting, has returned home after a five months' visit to American meetings, mostly in and about Philadelphia, although he visited New York, Chicago, and Canada.

Lyman G. Cosand, Friends' pastor at Barclay, Kansas, has been elected Chairman of the Kansas State Prohibition Party Committee. He is a graduate of Friends' University, class of 1912, and is still a young man. For the present his headquarters will be at Barclay.

AN APPRECIATION

Hugh W. Maxwell, a notice of whose death appears in another column, was born in Wayne County, Indiana, in 1820, the year before the establishment of Indiana Yearly Meeting. His father, John Maxwell, was a prominent elder in Indiana Yearly Meeting, and was efficient in service on the Boarding School and College Committee until his death in 1861. His son, Hugh W., was a worthy successor, both in the church and in his active interest in the school and college. In 1840 he married Ruth Ann James. They resided near Earlham for some years on the Boarding School farm. The wife and mother died in 1858. Of their children three are living, Sarah Maxwell, and Caroline Blacklidge, of La Harpe, Kansas, and Lindley H., who resides in Chili, South America.

Subsequently, Hugh W. Maxwell married Miriam A. Rambo, daughter of Elijah and Naomi Coffin, and for several years a prominent member of the Earlham Trustees. She died in Colorado about one year ago, in the ninety-third year of her age. Soon after her death Hugh W. Maxwell returned to Kansas, and made his home with his daughter, Caroline, until his death. His interest in Earlham was constant and was manifested in many ways. In the first effort at an endowment in 1871, he was one of the first and most liberal subscribers, and only a few days before his death, he sent to a trustee of the College a subscription of $3,000. Thus to the last, though he had lived in Kansas and California more than thirty years, he manifested his abiding interest and confidence in the institution, and verified the declaration of the Psalmist concerning the righteous "He shall bring forth fruit in old age." One manifestation of his loyalty to the Church was his subscription for Friends Review from its beginning, and its successor, The American Friend.

CAMPAIGN FOR NEW MEMBERS

Under date of January 9th, Homer G. Biddlecum, Secretary of the Committee having in charge the campaign for 1,000 new members in Wilmington Yearly Meeting, writes us as follows:

"The campaign for 1,000 members is progressing. Although the year is really almost half gone, the membership at large is only just now awakening. But the reports from the field, and general indications are that our efforts will be very far from in vain. The Friends' Church must move forward, or, I believe God will remove her candlestick from its place. Surely with our strong aggressive leaders the order along the line will be 'Forward, March.'"

UNITED MISSION CONFERENCE

A Conference in the interest of the United Mission Campaign will be held at Thorntown, Indiana, February 1 and 2, which should be attended largely by Friends in that section. One at Valparaiso, Indiana, January 18-19, might receive the attention of Laporte Friends, while one at Logansport, Indiana, January 20-21, might well be attended by Friends in New London and Kokomo Quarters who did not avail themselves of the one at Kokomo some time ago.

He was educated in the home schools and in Friends' Boarding School at Earlham. He was a life long member of Cedar Friends' Meeting, and for a number of years served as elder. He took great pleasure in entertaining visiting ministers and workers, and never tired of doing for the Church. He is survived by the widow and five children.

Dunbar—Mary Edith Dunbar, daughter of J. Allen and Anzonetta H. Dunbar, was born at Lowell, Kansas, and died at Portland, Oregon, December 15, 1913, aged 18 years 1 month and 4 days. She was a birthright member of Friends, and early manifested Christian graces and a devotional spirit that ripened with the years. Her mind was full of plans to help the C. E. work, the poor and the unfaithful. She had planned to serve on a hospital staff in the foreign field, but died of heart failure while suffering from the gripe,

SKIN CLEARED

By Simple Change in Food

It has been said by a physician that most diseases are the result of indigestion.

There's undoubtedly much truth in the statement, even to the cause of many unsightly eruptions, which many suppose can be removed by applying some remedy on the outside.

By changing her food a Kan. girl was relieved of an eczema which was a great annoyance to her. She writes:

"For five months I was suffering with an eruption on my face and hands which our doctor called eczema, and which caused me a great deal of inconvenience. The suffering was almost unbearable.

"The medicine I took only gave me temporary relief. One day I happened to read somewhere that eczema was caused by indigestion. Then I read that many persons had been relieved of indigestion by eating Grape-Nuts.

"I decided to try it. I liked the taste of the food and was particularly pleased to notice that my digestion was improving and that the eruption was disappearing as if by magic. I had at last found, in this great food, something that reached my trouble.

"When I find a victim of this affliction I remember by own former suffering and advise a trial of Grape-Nuts food instead of medicines."

Because of its nearness to Philadelphia it is surrounded by a large group of devoted friends who are continually helping the School, and bringing to it their religious concerns, and their interest in the

Not Old, Not New

JOHN T. McFARLAND, D. D.

I like it not, this common view
That calls the passing season old;
I like it not, and will not hold
The year that lies before us new.

No year is old, no year is new;
Time passes not on faltering feet;
The days that come are not more fleet
Than those that pass beyond our view.

Nor past nor future is remote;
Time is the chords upon the lyre;
The present is the point of fire
At which we strike the vibrant note.

Into the past run back the chords,
They bear the tones of all the years;
They throb with all the hopes and fears
The future holds in speechless words.

Life lies not in the passing hour;
The silent seasons are not dead;
The fountains of the soul are fed
By springs which pulse with vital power.

The future comes not with blank page—
An empty book where may be writ—
The fool's mistakes and wisdom's wit—
It bears the hieroglyphs of age,

Which we translate as best we can;
The speech divine to human tongue,
The wisdom neither old nor young,
The secret of the life of man.

Time is the atmosphere of God;
Our morrows and our yesterdays
Are but the wind that sports and plays
Upon the surface of the flood.

Life adds another to its rings;
Love's calyx with its heart of gold,
Will slowly in the light unfold,
For God is in the soul of things.

The World in Action

Celebrating Hundredth Anniversary of Missions—

In December the Baptists celebrated the one hundredth anniversary of their mission in Burmah, and during the same month the Congregationalists celebrated a like anniversary of their mission in India. The story of these one hundred years has been one of remarkable faith, apostolic zeal and praiseworthy loyalty and liberality. During the period 364 missionaries were sent to their mission in India, and $7,649,000 was contributed for the work.

Catholic Money for Educational Purposes—Two gifts amounting to $1,300,000.00 have been entrusted to the care of Cardinal Gibbons for educational purposes in the Catholic Church. This is no new thing in Catholic circles. One million of this sum was raised by the Knights of Columbus, and the balance was the bequest of a maiden lady deceased in Baltimore.

Go to Church Sunday—Without doubt every Sunday ought to be a go-to-Church day, but all over the country special days with this as the slogan are bringing multitudes to the religious services who are not accustomed to this practice. Now it has been proposed by the Chicago Christian Endeavorers that February 1st be made a continent-wide go-to-Church day. Religious papers are passing on the suggestion with commendation.

No Change in Church Name—A vote on the question of changing the name of the M. E. Church South, by eliminating the word "South" and substituting therefor "in America," has resulted adversely, the vote standing 1,333 for to 4,002 against.

Robert E. McClure, of Blairsville, Pa., pastor of the United Presbyterian Church, who for many years has been a leader in the fight against the liquor traffic, was shot at recently while going home from a night prayer meeting. The bullet struck a Bible he was carrying under his arm, and his life was saved. That bullet is the greatest temperance speech made in Pennsylvania in years.

Next Week

In next week's issue of THE AMERICAN FRIEND, among many other matters of profit will appear the second chapter on "The Place of Quaker History in Church History," by Prof. Elbert Russell. Another article will be by John S. Kimber on "How to be an Overcomer." There will be the third installment of "A Monthly Meeting Chronicle," showing the progressive development of an interesting situation in a somewhat average Monthly Meeting. There will be other features of special interest and profit.

Educational Conditions in Cuba

Some striking facts are brought to light by the recent census of the municipal district of Holguin, Cuba. This is of particular interest to Friends, because Holguin is one of the four municipal districts where Friends are working in Eastern Cuba, and may be taken as fairly representative of the entire field.

Out of a population of 64,238 there are 45,159, or more than 70 per cent, who cannot read or write. Of the children between the ages of 6 and 14, less than one-fourth are in school of any kind. There are 4,698 children between the ages of 15 and 18. Of these only 146 are in any kind of school. In order to give all the children of the district the opportunity of a common school education it would be necessary to increase the present number of teachers, both public and private, by 268, allowing 50 pupils to one teacher.

The rural districts are the ones which suffer most from this lack of instruction. This need will have to be met by educating native teachers and sending them into these rural communities. The following letter written to the Secretary of the Friends Mission by the mayor of one of these villages, well shows the attitude of the leading men in these country places:

"My Very Dear Sir:

"The reason for this letter is to make plain to you that, understanding as I do the need in this progressive town of a school where the children of today, who will be the citizens of tomorrow, may get a good education, and knowing the character of your work, I offer to you for a school house one of the houses I own here, which is in one of the best locations, provided you consent to let my children receive free instruction and an hour of English for myself. I have a genuine desire for the reasons given, that there may be a school of the kind you will establish in this locality.

"Please let me know what you think of this.

"Your humble servant,

"B. LOPEZ."

The future His mercy shall clear,

And what looks dark in the distance

May brighten as I draw near.

The Church Must Be Spiritual

"That he might present the Church to himself a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish." In these words Paul sets up a standard for the Church at Ephesus that may well serve as the ideal for collective sainthood in all the ages. It marks the exclusion of all that is contaminating and therefore weakening to spiritual energy. It marks the inclusion of all that is holy in life and in action.

In recent numbers we have said the Church must be progressive and that it must be efficient. But both these qualities must ever be predicated upon that which is truly spiritual. As Friends, from the days of Fox and Barclay and Penn, we have emphasized the idea of intensive personal religion, not alone for the sake of the individual, but for the sake of the fruitage of endeavor in a corporate or collective capacity. We can never afford to lower this standard. Human society in every age needs this ideal of righteous living.

All too frequently, however, religion is regarded negatively. Morality becomes the standard, and conduct is the gauge of Christian experience. The Church may be without blemish when measured by human vision, and yet not be holy in the Bible sense. Individuals may forsake their grosser sins and stand as honest, honored and ideal men and women in the community and yet may not be followers of Jesus Christ. Acceptance of Him means more than a mental belief, more than a mental assent to His divinity. The Christ of history, who is not revealed as the Christ of today, able and ready to save the men and women of this generation as when He walked by the sea of Galilee, is not the Christ who can redeem this old world from its superstition, its blindness and its sin.

Theoretical religion has no attractions for a world that needs help. Professional Christianity is a broken staff upon which humanity leans in vain. How often men and women labor in the name of Jesus of Nazareth, but their hearts are far from Him! No concept of Him as the Savior of earth can be comprehended except it be a concept of experience.

The Church must be more than a social club, if it would win men for the Kingdom of God. It must ignore the class spirit and regard every man a brother, it it would meet the requirements of a progressive age, in which human brotherhood is written large over the portals of every field of human endeavor. It must possess the sacrificial spirit that characterized the work of the Master, and which will send men and women out, hot hearted, after their lost brethren upon whom the grip of sin has laid its heavy hand.

But the Church finds its true measurement not so much by what it does as by what it is. Indeed what it does is the direct fruition of what it is. No stream can flow in refreshing fullness that does not have a source. No light can stream in beneficence for the multitudes that is not the product of that which is the essence of light itself. Spiritual power depends upon the indwelling of the Spirit. Christian activity is the outflow of Christian experience. Holiness, which is the state of right Christian living, is itself the fruition of heart relationship with God.

No organism of the Church, no system of service, no charitable spirit can be a substitute for the holy fire that ought to be kindled in every life by the presence of the Holy Ghost, revealing Jesus Christ in forgiveness and in keeping power. A right relationship with the Father, communion with Him as the channel of blessing, the bestowal of Heavenly grace upon the surrendered life, the abiding presence of the Divine in the soul, the revelation of Divine truth, the consequent inspiration for Christian service, these are the elements that are the outflow of the touch of God upon human life and that in turn become the sources of power in the religious activities of the world.

From the days of Fox, Friends have preached a doctrine that accords with man's deepest needs, the doctrine of universal approach to God by the light and power of the spirit, an approach that is open to every man of every race of every age, who will but open his heart to receive Jesus Christ. Oftimes we have failed, no doubt, to live up to our denominational standards. In the maze of formality and custom and even of tradition, we have sometimes lost the Divine connection by being concerned mostly with outward adjustments, the correctness of our dress and speech and conduct. It is vital to remember that conduct is the fruitage of the real life. But what is more important still, at a time when as Friends we are beginning to get a forward look and to take a forward step, is to learn that power and efficiency are the direct products of spiritual experience that is based upon harmonious relationships with Jehovah.

Our concern is that a baptism of consecration and holy devotion may come upon the Society of Friends, individually and collectively, and, filled with the consciousness of a holy mission to exemplify the truth of the Gospel we preach to the needy multitudes all about us, we may take on a new and larger life as a denomination and enter upon new and larger fields of service in the Master's name. God grant that we may not turn a deaf or indifferent ear to the call of a mighty opportunity!

Shall We Have a Conference of Men?

We may with propriety be permitted a final statement, at least for the present, relative to the suggested conference of the men of our Church. In large part the general discussion has gone wide of the mark and has concerned itself with the merest incidentals of the proposition. It may be well to recall our first statement in regard to the matter made on December 11th, and which was as follows:

"The development of a universal and comprehensive financial plan that will provide an income adequate to the necessities of our Boards, the co-ordination of our activities without the loss that comes from friction and unnecessary duplication, the efforts to equip the church for the larger work that comes by reason of our association with others in the great brotherhood of Christian service, the insight into our whole mechanism of ecclesiastic government as applied to the tasks of world redemption, are obligations which the men of our church cannot shirk."

These suggestions need to be considered somewhat in detail:

1. A financial plan. The need of a comprehensive and more efficient financial plan among Friends in this country ought to be self-evident to every student of our denominational history during recent years. In our judgment this is vital and fundamental to our progress as a Church body. Mead A. Kelsey, whose article appears in this number, has given a most timely exhortation upon the subject. Perhaps he will find he is building better than he knew.

In many of our Yearly Meetings and especially in the Five Years Meeting, we have been adding to our denominational machinery as the climax of a growing purpose to take our proper place in the ranks of Christian discipleship, bent upon performing the gigantic tasks to which the Church is being called, but we have neglected to provide adequate means of financial support that will be commensurate with the work to be done.

The Society of Friends cannot get away from this burning problem unless it chooses to run away from the clear call of duty. Almost all our Boards and Committees are constantly finding themselves hedged in by financial limitations that bring discouragement, and that take the very life out of all their plans and purposes. No denomination can thrive upon such a situation. It is impossible to exaggerate it, for the reality of it is being emphasized upon every hand, and is not open to question.

The Foreign Missionary Board is a lone exception to the category of Committees that feel the financial stress at every turn, and even this Board finds itself handicapped in practically every field and is almost barred from answering any of the many urgent calls that are constantly coming to undertake new enterprises. How many other Boards, at least of the Five Years Meeting, are able to do anything creditable, all because the funds are not available for the work that has been planned? How many Yearly Meeting departments are running a whole year upon twenty-five and fifty dollar appropriations, and doing good work, too, up to the limit of their possibilities, when they ought to have hundreds of dollars at their command?

How often it is that the appeal comes to Yearly Meetings to keep down the appropriations and the consequent assessments! How often Monthly Meetings come to the close of the year with Yearly Meeting stock delinquent, and local expenses unprovided for fully, unless a few individuals get together and practically double their contributions! The picture is not of universal application, we are glad to know, but it is sufficiently indicative of a general and wide-spread condition as to provoke the deepest solicitude on the part of the whole membership.

The remedy is not easy to find. It is a problem for serious-minded, thoughtful, practical, consecrated men. We are certain that our membership as a whole is not poor beyond the ability to provide. Our trouble apparently is a lack of an adequate system that distributes the burden of our giving proportionately. We know men and women among Friends who give until it hurts, and they do it with cheerfulness, but there are too many others who do not give at all, and a still larger number who do not give regularly, systematically and with proper discrimination.

It is our conviction that we have no greater problem just now that is pressing for settlement than that of devising a plan that will provide for an equitable distribution among all our membership of the burden of support for all our Church activities. In a sense this problem is fundamental to the larger problem of getting our members more generally to feel the responsibilities of the varied work of the Church. Humanity is interested in any mechanism of which it is a part, and for which it is paying something. It is a psychological law which we cannot ignore even in spiritual things.

Problems of finance are peculiarly the work of men, not that women can not say and do much that is valuable on the question, but the chief burden of it must in the nature of the case rest with the men. Nothing will so arouse the interest of our men as to bring them face to face as men with some of the great problems of the Church that are pressing for solution. The Church is well nigh at a standstill for lack of an adequate solution of this particular problem. It is a problem which a conference of men ought to face and that right speedily.

2. The co-ordination of our activities. This problem is largely wrapped up in that of finance. Probably it will be found by proper examination that we have too many Boards; that some can be combined profitably as various departments under one head. This great and multiplex problem of conservation is one about which the manhood of our Church needs to bestir itself.

3. Our relationship to other denominations in Christian work. Primarily there are adjustments in this regard that ought to call forth the serious attention of our Quaker manhood, exerting itself in its manhood capacity as a stimulus to greater endeavor in the work of God.

All these and more which we cannot give the space to discuss now, constitute problems that are vital to our further progress, and it is still our conviction that a conference of the men of our Church, bringing them face to face with these important matters and making them feel their responsibility relative thereto in a way that has never yet been done, is fraught with tremendous possibilities to the whole future of the Society of Friends in America, possibilities which we cannot afford to brush aside lightly by surface objections or by studied indifference. The problem is now with Friends so far as this paper is concerned, at least for the present.

The Christian State

BY LINDLEY D. CLARK

Imagine a life-boat of modest proportions and scantily provisioned sailing alongside a mighty liner loaded with passengers. Officers and crew of the smaller vessel proclaim the impending destruction of the larger, with all that it contains, and urge those on board to leave possessions, interests, and companionships and come aboard the smaller craft that they may escape with their lives, though obviously but few could be taken aboard. Is that a picture of the Ship of Zion offering deliverance to a doomed world? Probably we have all heard the Gospel message set forth in terms no more inclusive or hopeful or inviting. Salvation was held to mean detachment. Saving themselves, they are unable to save others.

Self-denial and sacrifice leading to individual salvation are indeed means and end of absolutely supreme importance and necessity. But these do not occupy the whole of the Christian horizon; there is in serving Christ more of attainment than of denial, and more of gain than of sacrifice. Moreover, the Gospel of Christ lays hardly less stress on social duty than on individual righteousness. The second commandment is like unto the first.

Bunyan's Pilgrim is an advance over the monk or recluse who shut himself away from a sinful world that he might cultivate personal piety; yet even Christian, with all his distress for those whom he leaves behind, moves in a contracted sphere, and to have depicted him otherwise would have been to fail to deliver a message to Bunyan's age. The Church as an institution had been by turns almoner and thrifty landlord, and oppressor and a resister of governmental oppression, and was at length an ally or rather a constituent part of the State. There was no indirection in its methods, since it set its goal and then summoned all to contribute of their means and service to achieve it. Organization and outward form, pomp and power, characterized the state establishment, and there was too little taught or thought of transforming grace and personal righteousness. However, the Dissenters grew and multiplied in strength and numbers, proclaiming salvation for individuals through their direct and personal contact with and experience of the Lord Jesus Christ. The advance was a tremendous one, and the gains made have never been lost.

But the disestablishment of the Church as a temporal power and its separation from the State, desirable and necessary as these steps were, have not been without a measure of loss. The multiplication of sects has gone on almost to the present time, due in part to an excess of individualism, and in larger degree perhaps to a failure to remember our Lord's teaching when He said, "all ye are brethren," or the words of James, "be not many teachers." To be sure, the swing of the pendulum has seemed to turn, and federation and unity are the subjects of discussion and in some degree of action: yet some appreciation of the difficulties attendant on this movement can be gained as we look upon the efforts of our own Society in this direction of closer fellowship. We have progressed, and hope for a fuller consummation of this purpose, but it is not yet realized.

Recent studies of the divisive effects of denominationalism develop facts that come almost as a surprise to some of us who have enjoyed a large degree of interchurch fellowship in Christian Endeavor and pastors' federations, and interdenominational efforts for local betterment, and who have heard and read more of federal conferences and the advances of certain denominations toward union than we have of divisions and rivalries and "come-outers." A study recently made by the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions in three widely separated counties, embracing thirty-two communities in a middle-western State, discloses forty-one denominations engaged competitively, having hitherto never co-operated in any movement. Ministerial support was necessarily at a minimum, with a strong effect on educational qualifications. Bitter denominational rivalry flourished in such an atmosphere, with its necessary accompaniments of insistence on non-essentials, one case being found where a "close-communion" minister could not take the sacrament with his wife. In such a condition of affairs it is surely the spirit of the Pharisee,—“not as other men are,”—and not the spirit of Christ that is at work. The influence of the churches on the community life has thus been weakened, since the citizens who should stand for righteousness are unable to come into a united purpose or to adopt harmonious methods of achieving desired ends, while the non-Christian is repelled rather than attracted.

Another consequence of the separation of the Church and the State has been the dissevering of religion and politics, so that each has been assigned a sphere into which the other can enter only with the practically certain results of arousing hostile criticism. There is no disputing the fact that there are types of religion that are out of place in governmental affairs, and that some types of politics are unassociable with a right attitude toward the Divine Ruler of heaven and earth; but when that fact appears with reference to either it should be accepted as a proof that such types should be either corrected or discarded. The fundamental expression of our attitude toward God, which is love and service, must be love and service to our fellowmen, and the channels of that expression are not limited to any one or any part of human endeavors or relationships.

We are revising and renewing our theory of social service, and if our practice falls short of our doctrine we shall receive the greater condemnation, as those who knew their Master's will and did it not. Social questions press for solution, and only the spiritual hermit or recluse can withhold a hand, and the hermit or recluse is not or has never been the exemplification of the Man who "went about doing good." To be sure, Jesus proposed no political program for His followers in Palestine, members of a subject nation, noted for the ease and quickness with which its hot resentments were kindled into action; and it is significant that it was to a subject nation and not to a dominant one that His Gospel was first preached. Satan's proffer of dominion was not in accord with Jesus' method. The allegiance of the spirit must come first, and no imposed system of worship or religion of influence or compulsory observance of ordinances would meet the requirements of that Kingdom whose symbol is the seed growing secretly or the little leaven that ultimately leavens the whole lump. But having the root and foundation there is no limitation on the extent or ramifications of the renewed life in man. The small stone cut out without hands is to become a mountain filling the whole earth. The knowledge of the Lord is to cover the earth as the waters cover the sea. No one who anticipates a millennial reign, no one who looks for the establishment at any time of the "new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness" contemplates for a moment the possibility of the existence then of social injustice or political immorality. Is the transformation to be accomplished by a vast cataclysm induced by supernatural forces, in which human agencies have no part, or are we to prepare ourselves for residence and service in that new Commonwealth by the development of life here? Is the ideal desirable only in some remote epoch and for a few of God's creatures, or would His will be accomplished and His glory be reflected in an increasingly accurate and inclusive realization here and now of the divine ideals that have been imparted to us?

Paul writes of looking for the "blessed hope and appearing of the glory of our great God and Savior, Jesus Christ." The apocalypse of John was of heavenly glories seen from the watch-tower of an exile's ocean-girt abode. But the Church that preaches today the tolerance of abuses to be endured in "patience fed by apocalyptic hope," is not the Church that has grasped the potentialities of redemption for humanity. A decadent age may be comforted by a vision of deliverance by the hand of death; but if the world is to progress it will be through the fulfillment of the petition, "Thy kingdom come." It is the duty and privilege of the man who sees and feels,—whose religion is current and vital,—to right the wrongs of the world.

"Our social organization is in our own hands. The Kingdom awaits our establishment. We must in the future apply not only the personal and individual tests of religious and moral satisfactions, but we must apply the tests of social results: economic prosperity, peace, and co-operation; physical efficiency, vigor, and longevity; emotional development in service, public spirit, and missionary zeal."

If the Christian religion can not meet the social and industrial problems of the world of today, with its governments and its corporate forces and organizations of labor, and with its demands for the services of unskilled and easily controlled workers, with the provincial attitude that seeks to measure conditions by local standards and ignores the common interest, and with the insistence of the worker for a changed method of the distribution of profits,—if in the face of all these and many other problems that press for settlement we are to claim that the full stature and efficiency of Christianity as a system of thought and life has been reached and its resources are exhausted, then it must give way to a better, unless the world is to go without a remedy. "But we have not so learned Christ.

Washington, D. C.

"If there is anywhere on your horizon a spot of light, fix your eyes upon it and turn your thoughts away from the clouds which may cover the rest of the sky. One spot of blue is worth a skyful of gray."

The Revival Most Needed

BY MEAD A. KELSEY

The writer believes that the revival most needed in many of our Friends meetings is one involving the better financing of the Lord's work. By this I mean not only larger giving but better management. I think it is true that almost any business concern would fail in twelve months' time if it were handled as poorly as as the business interests of many of our meetings are handled. Antiquated method and tardy action seem to predominate. When you find a finance committee not getting to work till two or three months of the financial year are past, what is to be expected but a year-long embarrassment and a deficit to crown it all? Add to this the use of methods that should long ago have gone to the scrap heap and you have one of the chief reasons for spiritual declension and lack of interest.

Few people seem to realize the relation between the financing of the work and spiritual prosperity, and yet the connection is close. It is a common practice to advise special prayer services in advance of a revival effort, and that is good, but I recall one Scriptural example where there was a desperate need of spiritual renewing, and the advice given was to bring all the tithes into the store-house and prove Jehovah, if He would not open the very windows of heaven and pour out such a blessing that there would not be room to receive it; and it is doubtless this service that is most needed in many instances today. God help us that we may be awakened to the tremendous importance of this matter.

BEQUESTS, A PERPETUAL SERVICE

But the matter about which I wish to speak more particularly is the duty and privilege of Friends who have been blest in the accumulation of considerable property to remember the Lord's work in disposing of the same by will or whatever manner may be chosen. I press this because I believe it to be a form of service precious in God's sight and yet too often forgotten by those competent to perform it. Many we know have remembered, and as a result there exist today, long after the decease of some of them, powerful agencies that are making for righteousness and the advancement of the Kingdom of God on earth. But, sad to say, some Friends have forgotten, and as a result large sums of money have gone out of the Church or failed at least of that larger ministry which the Master had a right to expect.

There are doubtless many cases in which it would be a blessing to children if a portion of the estate were set aside for benevolent purposes. Why not make Christ an heir? We hope to inherit with Him yonder, why not let Him inherit from us here?

As to objects that may be considered in the arranging of bequests, there stand out always in the foreground our educational institutions. Here we touch the young life of the church most directly, and that life too which is to be an ever-increasing influence both in church and civic life. If we only realized how much this meant we would be more anxious to find ways of helping. There are endowments that need increasing, equipments that need improving, and buildings that are sadly needed. Why not show our faith in Christian education by helping here?

Another matter that should appeal strongly to every one who loves the Lord Jesus is the missionary interests of the church. The greatest task, and the most urgent of the church today is the evangelization of the world. And the biggest problem of this task is the matter of funds to carry on the work. Fields are white, doors are open, and laborers are waiting to be sent. The one need is for money. How fortunate if we are in a position to help supply that. It is noticeable in the annual reports of the great missionary boards of other denominations that they are the frequent recipients of bequests, large and small, and that these form a very considerable part of their income, and why should not Friends be abreast of these? Every Yearly Meeting has its own board of missions, but with the commendable tendency to put the work of the Yearly Meetings into the hands of the American Friends Board of Missions, that would be the best organization to entrust with funds.

Again we may consider the home field. There is the evangelistic and church extension work suffering for support almost everywhere. No part of our obligation is more neglected than this. Lastly there is our home meeting. Is there anything that can be done by a bequest that will contribute to the permanency of the work here? Perhaps it is a ministers home that is needed, and there is a sore need in many places.

Certainly there is no lack of opportunity. In truth, there is almost a bewildering array of needs, but this should not discourage us. On the contrary, it should stimulate to prayerful searching to know what God would have us do, and then we should do it! Procrastination at this point has often been fatal to good intentions.

Now in all that I have said I hope that I have not encouraged any one in deferring to a bequest what ought to be given before. It is certainly far preferable where possible that money intended for benevolent uses be bestowed during the lifetime of the donor, of which we have many illustrious examples, but in many cases this is not feasible, or even possible, and it is to this class that I appeal, and I believe that in this matter I express the mind of the Master.

A Monthly Meeting Chronicle

BY JUNIUS JUNIOR

II.

The records show that Slow Valley Monthly Meeting convened at Friends meeting house in Newtown for its second session of the year, at 10 o'clock on February 8, 1913. The day was blustery and cold, but stimulated somewhat by the closing events of the meeting a month before, there was a slightly increased attendance, forty-eight men, women and children braving the storm to be present. As usual, the women predominated.

During the devotional service, there was a slight suggestion of uncertainty, if not of expectancy, that might have been noted by the careful observer. Otherwise the occasion was typical of the usual program. The pastor gave a brief discourse upon the parable of the talents, and all were encouraged to make proper use of their God-given opportunities.

Two of the women gave brief testimonies, and after a period of waiting, the Clerk read the usual form of opening minute, that brought the assembled company face to face again with the business of the Church. The minutes were read and approved, but they bore no record of the slight diversion that had almost threatened the equanimity of the existing order a month before.

There was little business to be transacted. Two families requested a transfer of their membership, one to the Congregationalists and one to the Methodists. Three delegates were named to attend the ensuing Quarterly Meeting, and the Clerk was directed to report to that body that Slow Valley Monthly Meeting was maintaining its usual standard of Christian living and religious activity.

One member mentioned the fact that a leak had sprung in the roof and the Chairman of the Bible School Committee said some new chairs were needed in the Bible School room, but action was deferred until there was more money in the treasury. A letter was read from the United Charity organization acknowledging receipt of the $2.17 collected for that work at the previous meeting, and thanking the meeting for its interest in the needy poor of the city.

The Clerk had announced that so far as he knew there was no further business, and the retired farmer, who at the January meeting had cautioned the Committees to be economical, had suggested that the concluding minute be read, when the business man who had nearly precipitated a crisis a month before arose and said that as it was not yet late, he felt that he could not leave the meeting without expressing some things which had been upon his mind. He said that he hesitated to say anything as he had been in the community only about two years, but conversations with a few of the young men in the meeting had emboldened him to speak.

He said that the conviction had been forming in his mind for some weeks that Slow Valley Meeting was not measuring up to its opportunities, that it was falling short of the ideal. He had observed that not over forty per cent of the membership were attending the Sabbath morning services with any degree of regularity, and not one out of three were ever present at the business sessions of the Church. He felt that the financial deficits were indicative of something wrong. What it was he could not say.

He was concerned for the welfare of the young people and concluded with these words:

"I have a longing to see our meeting here a center of religious and social activity, making use of every opportunity to reach out a helping hand to every discouraged or indifferent man or woman in this community. I regret that I am unable to suggest a remedy for the delinquencies which to me are so apparent, but I have a conviction that the time has come when this Monthly Meeting should recognize that we have reached a crisis, and that we should determine to face it as becomes Christian men and women interested in the religious life of the people all about us."

A silence fell upon the little company assembled that soon reached the stage of embarrassment. In a few faces there was a new look of interest, but it was evident that among the majority, the words just spoken had met with no intelligent or sympathetic response. The retired farmer finally arose and said that, as he understood it, there had been no definite proposition made that called for consideration, and again made the suggestion that the concluding minute be read.

Whereupon the pastor arose and said that he felt the situation perhaps called for a few words upon his part. He recognized that there was some force in what they had heard. He felt that no one could afford to be satisfied with present experiences, but that all should look forward hopefully for better things. He realized that their situation was peculiarly difficult. They had a congregation composed in part of city members, busied with the demands of a growing population, and in part of country members to whom the hard times and the drouth of the last summer had brought considerable discouragement. He stated further in conclusion, "I have taken occasion to examine the conditions of some other Friends meetings and have come to the conclusion that under all the circumstances we are doing reasonably well, but I want to express the hope that all our members will improve every opportunity to do better work this year than they were able to do last year."

The retired farmer, in a short, snappy two-minute talk voiced his conviction that there was nothing the matter with the meeting, and cautioned the members against new innovations that interfere with the poise and dignity of a congregation, that for half a century had maintained the Quaker standards in that community.

Two men and three of the women made similar remarks, one woman going so far as to intimate somewhat broadly that the meeting had gotten along pretty well for more than a generation, and that those who did not like their customs might be able to find usages more to their liking elsewhere. Upon a few faces there was an evident look of concern over the trend of the discussion, but apparently no one had the courage to express his thoughts. Opinions had been packed into one mould so long that new ones were not easy of expression.

One of the farmers finally ventured to suggest that in his opinion there was something in what their business friend had said about conditions in the congregation. He knew of several rural Friends with horses and carriages and three with automobiles who never came to Church any more. What the matter was he did not know, but he thought something might be gained if the meeting would look into the situation.

This brought two others to their feet, one man and one woman, in defense of the existing order, the man, who was a retired physician, saying that he was pained that there should be any criticism of their meeting, which to him had been an ideal religious home for more than forty years. Apparently the power of custom had a deep hold upon Slow Valley Meeting, which could not be up-rooted by any ordinary means.

Finally a young man arose, a school teacher in a nearby country district, and said that he was much interested in the discussion that had been taking place. A look of surprise went around the room, for not in years had a young member presumed to speak in a business meeting. But the young teacher persisted in his remarks. His sympathy was wholly with the merchant who had first spoken. He felt that the members should be willing to face the situation and at least see if conditions could not be improved. "I am thoroughly convinced," he said in conclusion, "that there is need of a revival among our members, that will touch our young people and set them to work in various ways, for their own good, the good of the Church, and the good of the city and community."

Emboldened by these remarks, the business man ventured to propose that a month hence, an hour of time be devoted to a discussion of the needs of the meeting, and its work in the neighborhood. The retired farmer said that as there would be little business at the March meeting, he saw no objections to the proposal, but said he had no doubt that after the discussion they would find that their Church was getting along better than any other in the city. Thereupon the Clerk read the concluding minute, and the company scattered to their homes, the majority in spite of themselves to face a month's period of self-examination and of solicitude about the community such as they had not experienced in years.

The probe of conscience and duty had been set to work and Slow Valley Monthly Meeting had begun to think about some of its problems.

The Conference of Men

A number of letters are coming in concerning the suggested conference of men. For the most part they are favorable, but in a few instances Friends are unable to see in the proposition anything beyond a disturbance of our principles regarding the equality of the sexes.

We print below a few that are typical of the differing views being expressed. It is regrettable that a great opportunity for our denomination must be destroyed by the injection of questions that are at most incidental and extraneous to the purposes of the proposed conference.

In our judgment we have gone far afield in our Church organism, if after allowing our women the widest latitude, we now must close the doors against the right of the manhood of the Church to meet together for the consideration of any questions in which it is expected to take a leading part.

Favoring the Conference of Men

We have been noting with some interest some views expressed in THE AMERICAN FRIEND recently with reference to the attitude of our denomination towards its women. The first was when Baltimore Yearly Meeting granted its women members the privilege of organizing a Woman's Foreign Missionary Society. The reporter of the item alluded to it as a "backward step." More recently a writer on the suggested Conference of men is uneasy for fear we are going to "drive a wedge to open a line of sex cleavage." I am very proud that I belong to a denomination of Christian people that has pioneered in so many valuable principles, as in the matter of slavery, the disuse of intoxicants, peace and arbitration, the discovery of the truth that the use of the outward ordinances is not necessary to a spiritual life or to worship, etc., and that was the very first to accord to women an equal place with men in the affairs of the Church. We taught all these principles until now, all denominations are more or less Quakerized on these points.

Now if the principle of the equality of the sexes in the Church is to be carried to the point of not allowing women to have anything of their own, nor the men to meet together in a conference on subjects of peculiar worth to them, then it appears to the writer that we are misusing liberty by throwing restrictions about our women, and about our men, that are unwarranted in the freedom of the gospel. We are unable to see in what way the calling of a conference of men, or the forming of a Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, when neither is legislating for the Church, can interfere with our position on the equality of the sexes. It is granting to each that which is the inherent right of any people. Not to allow Quaker women to join hands with all other Christian women in a great forward religious movement would savor of bondage rather than of liberty, and would constitute a "backward step" toward the dictation of one part of the membership to another that Friends have now gone too far to permit.

Through our Woman's Foreign Missionary Union we are members of the Federated Board of Missions, and through this we are represented on the Edinboro Continuation Committee which is the leading organization in the world for the promotion of world-evangelization. Is it a "backward step" for Quaker women to be so connected and represented? Nay! But a most delightful step forward, and one that we as Friends could not have taken had we not our Woman's Foreign Missionary organization. By all means let the men hold a conference and the women have their missionary society, and they will then come together in our regular Church councils, each stronger and wiser for the responsibilities of the Church because they have thus conferred separately in non-legislative meetings.

Opposing the Conference of Men

We have read the editorials in THE AMERICAN FRIEND in reference to the proposed Conference of men, which it was thought might be as much to our denomination as the Methodist Conference at Indianapolis was to the Methodist Church; and the editor wants to know what we think about it.

The Methodist Conference was an official body, acting for the Church and under its appointment. A Conference of men is in direct line with the teaching of those Churches, which have not kept abreast of Friends in according an equal place to women in the management of the business of the Church, in the privilege of becoming ministers, and in making them equal in all other lines of effort. Such a meeting might have done three hundred years ago, but with the great onward movement of civilization, it seems entirely out of place among those who have stood for an entirely opposite condition.

The Friends have given to the world a great body of strong men and women, who have devoted themselves to different lines of effort. These have been all out of proportion to their numbers in membership. No other religious denomination compares with it. It has exerted an influence over government and the development of civilization as lasting as the nation itself. The best educated people, even outside of Friends, have come to recognize that this came about, not only as a result of sound principles, but also from the emphasis of the individual guidance of the spirit, and the absence of dictatorial leadership or ecclesiastical power to crush its development in the different members. It was only within a religious society so democratic as the Friends, that so great a number of such individuals could be developed.

We do not plead for tradition. We believe in living up to and keeping abreast with the Divine Spirit in meeting the conditions of the age; but if by any means the Friends all come to the place where they are willing to sacrifice their democratic principles in reference to the equality of the membership in regard to sex, or for any other consideration, which has been the most vital part of our existence, we shall lose our inheritance, or it will be given to another.

If it is necessary to have a conference of men in order to study the conditions of the Church from the viewpoint of men, it is just as necessary to have a conference of women also to study the conditions of the Church from the viewpoint of women; then let them come together with their different views.

One of our English Friends, with regret, expressed the opinion that our branch of Friends is rapidly becoming ecclesiastic. Is it true?

Haddonfield, New Jersey.

ANNA MAY PEMBERTON.

A Favorable Statement

"Now as to the proposed convention for men; I hesitate to say much, for I fear that if it should be held at any considerable distance from here, I should not be able, financially, to attend. But I do think such a move would be fraught with much good to those who would participate, and through them to the Church at large. * * * I think the sex question should never have come into the discussion at all. It seems narrow. Our good sisters have their W. F. M. S., and other distinctly women's organizations that are permanent. To these no man objects. * * *"

Lynn, Indiana.

MILO S. HINCKLE.

Against the Conference

I think a conference of men Friends only is taking a backward step in the annals of Quakerism, and as our discipline contains this clause, "There are no distinctions in the rights, privileges or responsibilities of the members because of sex," it seems discourteous to say the least to our women Friends. I do not know what these vital problems are that confront us, but think that women Friends may be helpful in solving difficult questions as in the past.

Other Statements

"I heartily approve of a convention of men of the Church and hope it may be arranged. Des Moines, Iowa, would be a good place to hold it as it is centrally located and has excellent railroad connections.

Oskaloosa, Iowa.

S. M. HADLEY.

"I approve your suggestion for a conference of men and suggest Indianapolis as the place, as it is more centrally located."

Westfield, Indiana.

GEO. H. MOORE.

"I want to give my most hearty endorsement to the suggestion for a great men's conference, and urge the claims of Des Moines or Oskaloosa as the place for holding the same. It ought to be a great thing for our men."

Lynnville, Iowa.

ZENO H. DOAN.

"I am in hearty sympathy with the question of a call for a meeting of the men in the Friends Church of America. This will take away nothing from the place of our women in our Church, but rather add to the importance of their work.

Wabash, Indiana.

A. J. FURSTENBERGER.

"I favor a call for a men's meeting."

IOWA PASTORS' ASSOCIATION

The Pastors' Association of Iowa Yearly Meeting met in midyear conference December 29-30, with twenty-seven members present.

The first session was opened by a devotional meeting, led by the Marshalltown pastor. The principal subject of the evening was "The Personal Testings of the Ministry." The leader not being present, one pastor after another told of the testings which had come to himself, some of which were as follows: 1. The yielding of a prosperous business career for the work of the ministry. 2. Feeling certain of the proper message at all times. 3. Being misunderstood. 4. Comparison with the ministry of other churches. This discussion brought a realization that actual perils followed the ministry, and the pastors on their knees together pledged themselves to stand the testings as God saw fit to let them come, and give themselves anew, first to the Father, then to each other.

On Tuesday morning Harry R. Keates led an earnest devotional service wherein all felt the touch of the Spirit. "God's purpose for Quakerism" was the subject opened by a paper by Clark Brown, which provoked much good, lively discussion. Various opinions were presented from various standpoints, but all seemed to agree in the thought that as George Fox met the condition of his own particular time, the purpose of the Church today is to meet the need of the humanity of our own local communities, and to work for the upbuilding of the kingdom of God on earth.

Florence Baker had charge of the devotional meeting in the afternoon, and very fittingly led all to see that the one thing needful was to sit at the feet of Jesus and not to be troubled by many things. The subject of the afternoon was "The Monthly Meeting." A paper was read by Edward Hartsuck and Dr. Edwards opened the discussion. Some of the suggestions for making our Monthly Meetings both profitable and interesting were:

1. Study the history of the Church.
2. Study the doctrines of the Church.
3. Study church finances.
4. Have programs along proper lines.
5. At least once a year, eat together, and have a social time before transacting business.
6. Have a roll call of members at least once a year and have messages read from absent members.

The matter of the Men's Conference was under discussion and a night letter sent to S. Edgar Nicholson encouraging the movement and inviting such a meeting to be held in Des Moines, Iowa.

Such interest was manifest in the various subjects and discussions, together with the general business of the conference, that almost every moment from 9:30 in the morning until 9:30 in the evening was used. Even around the dinner and supper tables various committees were seated together and worked while eating.

The closing sermon was preached by George Deshler. The Marshalltown people were present at this service and enjoyed with the pastors the splendid discourse on "Remember them that are in bonds as bound with them." The close fellowship with each other, and the hospitality of the Marshalltown people were such that those present will not forget it soon.

ANNA SMITH, Secretary.

WHITTIER COLLEGE

In number 1, volume 1, of "The Western Collegian," published at Los Angeles, California, November 15, 1913, a whole page is given to Whittier College. Following a brief historical statement, a comprehensive and laudatory description of the college is given that should be highly pleasing to all friends of the institution. It closes with these words, "With a loyal student body, a helpful alumni and a working faculty, the future promises a success even beyond that of the past."

In this same magazine the foreword is given by President Thomas Newlin, of Whittier, in part, as follows:

"This is an age of Democracy. This is nominally realized in the State and it is coming in the Church, but in the American public schools the fight is on. In school and college there is an experienced, trained and mature authority on one side, and an inexperienced, untrained, immature and restless mass on the other side. If in school and college we would keep abreast of the spirit of the age, we must seek motives rather than seek to rule artificially from without. The right to rule anywhere in America cannot much longer be an official right, but common interests and justice for all must rule. This is no easy task, yet it is a result worth striving for by all our schools and colleges."

NOTICE TO FRIENDS' BIBLE SCHOOLS

All remittances, from this time on, for supplies, whether for the past or future, should be sent to the Friends' Bible School Board, Fairmount, Indiana.

RICHARD HAWORTH, Pres.
P. W. RAIDABAUGH.

FRIENDS' BIBLE SCHOOL SUPPLIES

As previously announced, the Bible School Board of the Five Years Meeting has purchased the Publishing Business of P. W. Raidabaugh, and has now moved the same to Fairmount, Indiana. All orders for supplies and all bills due should be sent to the address given below. The Board is now prepared to fill all orders promptly and furnish any kind of supplies published by any Denominational or independent Sunday-school Supply House.

In a short time the Board will send out order blanks for supplies for the second quarter, and asks that all schools order all supplies of whatsoever kind they may desire through our office. The Board will furnish all supplies at the same price paid the publishers. In ordering through our office, you confer a financial favor upon the Board, and at the same time are advancing our own Denominational Bible School work.

Our Own Publications

The Board is editing the "Advanced Quarterly," formerly published by P. W. Raidabaugh, is enlarging it and will call it "The Adult Quarterly," and hopes to furnish it at the former prices, viz.: 3¼ cents each in clubs to one address; single copies, 5 cents each, or 20 cents a year. The Teacher's Quarterly will also be edited by the Board, but will probably be the same size and price as formerly.

It may be impossible to make much change in the Intermediate Quarterly, though the Editors are at work on an entirely new Quarterly, much enlarged and admirably adapted to the Secondary Division of the Schools, viz.: young people from 12 to 20 years of age. If it can be gotten ready, it will probably cost 5 cents per copy, or 20 cents a year. The Lesson Sheets will be the same matter as the Adult Quarterly and probably the Child's Lesson Leaf and Youth's Friend for next quarter will be about as formerly published. Just as rapidly as possible permanent changes will be made for all our Denominational Publications.

The entire Board, consisting of twenty-six members, is responsible for the material in all supplies published by the Board, though the two Editors selected by the Board, viz.: Wilbur K. Thomas, New England Yearly Meeting, and Richard Haworth, Indiana Yearly Meeting, have prepared the material. The Board asks for suggestions and help from all available sources.

Other Publications

The Graded Helps as furnished by the International Lesson Committee and supplied by Denominational Houses should be ordered through our office. Many Friends' Schools are already using them. The Board is prepared to fill all such orders and supply all Graded Helps through its office. A single order sent by any Bible School may include all supplies of every kind for the entire quarter. The Board will gladly furnish all Sunday-school requisites at publisher's prices.

Address all orders to FRIENDS' BIBLE SCHOOL BOARD,
Fairmount, Indiana.

BALTIMORE YEARLY MEETING

Washington, D. C.—Baltimore Quarterly Meeting was held in Washington, D. C. on the 10th and 11th instant, with a goodly number of Friends and others in attendance. In addition to the usual business sessions, Daniel Oliver, a missionary from London Yearly Meeting to Brumana, Syria, gave a most interesting account of his work at a special session on Saturday morning. President Robert L. Kelly, of Earlham College, had edifying service in the meeting on Sunday morning, and spoke to the Young People in their meeting on Sunday evening. At the concluding meeting Sunday evening, Alsina Andrews and Sada Stanley, missionaries from Jamaica, now returning to their field, told of their experiences and other Friends' work there. The reports from our own meetings showed commendable progress.

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING

West Elkton—Edgar Woolam and wife of Cleveland, Ohio, also Roy Woolam, now of Chicago, all former residents of West Elkton, were in attendance at the meeting here December 28. Roy Woolam preached a very acceptable sermon to an attentive and interested audience.

In the autumn, the ladies of the meeting at West Elkton were organized by the pastor, Fannie Elliott, into a society known as "Social Workers." Its aim is to promote the social and financial interests of the Church, and through the monthly programs to instruct and stimulate interest in the several lines of church work. The society is proving both interesting and helpful.

Spiceland—Spiceland Friends received into membership at their Monthly Meeting held January 3d, eight young ladies ranging in age from sixteen to eighteen. Through the influence of the Sabbath School, of which they were faithful members, and through the encouragement of their earnest teacher, they were led to Christ as their Savior and desired a church home with Friends. On Sabbath morning, the 11th, they were welcomed by the congregation. An appropriate sermon was given by the pastor, Raymond Holding. Special music was rendered by the choir, making the service impressive and helpful to all.

Charlottesville—The meeting at Charlottesville, Indiana, has employed Walter Jerge, of Earlham College, to serve them as pastor for the present year. Zona Williams White, the former pastor, gave up the work at her own request, but still resides within the limits of the meeting and is a great aid in the work.

Little Blue River—A series of meetings began at Little Blue River Meeting, in Walnut Ridge Quarterly Meeting, on November 13th, and closed Christmas evening, continuing six weeks. The meeting was conducted by F. Ora Wilcoxin and wife, of Shirley, Indiana, and Charles E. Wicker. There were twenty-four conversions, thirty-two renewals and thirty-eight were sanctified. A large percent. of the converts were children from the age of six to fifteen years. In our Sabbath morning meetings, since the close of the revival, we give the children a special time for testimonies, of which they take advantage. Our meeting has taken a forward step in spiritual life, and we are making an effort to hold what ground we have gained and "go forward."

Carthage—J. Edgar Williams, pastor of the Friends' Church, requested the members of his congregation to bring their Bibles to the morning service on January 11th. The message given by him was a strong tribute to the Divine authorship of the Bible, and its place in the world today. The text was II. Timothy 3: 16. He stated that the Bible is the most popular book in all the world, because it is God's word. The pastor's message in the evening was brief. He was followed by Russell Ratliff, an instructor in our public high school, who gave an able report of the Student Volunteer Convention held at Kansas City.

The auditorium of the Friends' Church at Carthage was beautifully arranged and decorated for the church social on Christmas night. There were exercises by the children and a girls' chorus. J. Earl Norris, as Santa Claus, sang to the children and distributed treats. J. Edgar Williams was completely surprised when R. E. Henley, on behalf of twenty members of his congregation, presented him with an envelope containing one hundred dollars.

Chester—In accordance with the communication from Olive R. Lindley, Secretary of the Home Missionary Society of Indiana Yearly Meeting, in The American Friend of October 30th, the women of Chester, Indiana, have organized a missionary club with fifteen charter members. We shall combine home and foreign missions in our scope of study, and endeavor to cover the thought contained in clause two of the constitution of the Woman's Home Missionary Council of Friends in America.

The Friends at Chester, Indiana (New Garden Quarter), are fully at one with all the work so far outlined by the different Boards of the Five Years Meeting, and will be glad when the various committees of our own Yearly Meeting have succeeded in coming entirely into line with them. We believe in using our young people as far as possible in the general church work. At our recent annual election of officers for our Bible School, Edith Hampton was made the Superintendent. Her fresh young vigor is already being felt in the work of the school. Being a teacher in our public school, she will be able to bring us more quickly into line with the graded system so strongly advocated by our Bible School Board. We shall be ready at the beginning of the next quarter to order all supplies through Friends' Bible School Board. More of our members are taking The American Friend than heretofore, and what is better, they are reading it. We shall unite with the simultaneous meetings from the 18th to 25th, and hope to report good results later.

Greensboro—Our meeting is growing in interest, under the faithful service of our young pastor, Joseph Young, who is with us every two weeks. We have a large class of young people in the Sabbath School and C. E., who have shown their interest the past year by giving $25.00 for foreign missions. They have also assisted the church in getting a new furnace. The C. E. members are given an opportunity to lead the Sabbath evening services when the pastor is not present. This is proving a blessing to the meeting.

KANSAS YEARLY MEETING

Northbranch—J. Perry Hadley, a former missionary at Douglas, Alaska, is serving his home meeting at Northbranch, Kansas, as pastor, the present year. His many friends will be interested to know that his little son, James Harold, who was born in Alaska, February 3, 1912, and whose mother died there shortly after his birth, is growing nicely, and keeps well under the care of his father and grandmother.

Northbranch Academy is prospering under the efficient instruction of Prof.

E. E. Hadley as principal, and Miss Lorena Kelsey, of Oskaloosa, Iowa, as assistant. The splendid training the students are receiving was shown by the midyear entertainment recently given by them. Almost all the selections given were the original work of the students.

Friendswood, Texas—James Armstrong is holding a series of meetings at this place with good results. He held meetings ten days at Kema near the bay, recently. There were several conversions and renewals.

League City, Texas—The Friends in League City are busy at work on the meeting house trying to get it completed before our next Quarterly Meeting, which will be held there the fourth Saturday in February. They will have the outside done, ready for the inside work in a few days, and all the bills paid, but we do not know yet where the money is to come from to pay for the seating. We hope that some of the Lord's children who read this may feel like helping in this time of need. William Worth is Chairman of the Building Committee. If any ministers feel drawn to attend the Quarterly Meeting, we will gladly welcome them.

OREGON YEARLY MEETING

Greenleaf, Idaho—In spite of the snow which was falling thickly, a fair number of Prohibitionists and friends gathered in the Friends' Church at this place on December 17th to greet Mr. A. A. Phelps, the new executive secretary of the party in this state. At the close of the meeting a Prohibition Club was organized with fifteen members.

Revival Campaign—Oregon Yearly Meeting is enjoying an unusual uplift through the revival campaign still in progress at a few points. Series of meetings have been held with good results at the following local meetings: Newberg and Springbrook, by Lindley A. Wells; Sherwood, by Homer Cox; at Middleton, and now in progress at Chehelm Center in charge of Charles Whitlock; at Lents, John Riley and wife, pastors; at Scotts Mills and Salem, Highland Meeting, in charge of O. B. Ong. It is the plan to have one series of meetings with each local congregation before the close of this year's work. We ask the prayers and sympathy of the older and stronger Yearly Meetings, that we, while weak and small as a Yearly Meeting, may be enabled to push the battle to the gate in this great and needy north-west country.

Salem—Salem Meeting extended a call to Josephine Hockett, of Kokomo, Indiana, to take the pastoral work at this place. She accepted the call, and came here with her husband the last of September, and took up the work at once. Through her preaching and influence, the interest began to revive. O. B. Ong was sent here to hold a revival meeting, that lasted four weeks. One hundred and seventy came to the altar. The members were the first to come, feeling their need of a more definite consecration and a deeper work of grace in their hearts, and there were many new converts. Ministers from the sister churches came in, and the fire falling upon them, they carried it back to their own services. So united were they that the churches of this part of the city joined in observing the week of prayer beginning first at the Friends' Church, resulting in great blessing to the people. We feel that Brother Ong's work here will long be remembered. We believe that the people are so united that Sister Hockett will be able to do a great work and be a great blessing to the church.

WESTERN YEARLY MEETING

Tangier, Ind., and Friends' Chapel, Ill.—Lindley Reagan, pastor at Marshall and Friends' Chapel, recently assisted the pastors, Martilia and Mary Cox, in a series of special meetings at Tangier, in which the church was much strengthened and some who had grown cold and inactive were awakened and renewed in religious service. L. M. Reagan expects to begin evangelistic meetings at Friends Chapel near Scotland, Illinois, about the middle of January. At this place is to be found a country Sabbath School and church which is certainly worthy of commendation in this day when so many country meetings are on the decline. Although a large percent. of the membership is located from two to five miles away, we find here a live progressive school, superintended by Miss Ora Legg, who though crippled in her hands so she cannot drive, walks rain or shine, over Illinois roads to her school, where they have four or five organized classes, and have graduated two normal classes and have an average attendance of about one hundred.

West Grove, Ind.—Levi Cox recently led in evangelistic services at West Grove Meeting in Hamilton County, where Mary Hiatt is serving as pastor.

A number were blessed in the meeting, and the membership in general was much strengthened.

Amo—On January 4th, Orley Smith, pastor at the Friends' Church at Amo, had a roll call at the Sabbath morning meeting. There was a good audience, and much interest manifested. The majority of the members present responded with a suitable scripture text or a testimony. There were greetings from some of the non-resident members. Many felt that it was a day of blessing.

First Church, Indianapolis—The First Friends' Church at Indianapolis, Indiana, is identifying itself with a movement joined in by practically all the churches of the city, the object being city-wide evangelism. The pastor, W. O. Trueblood, will conduct services each night for a period of two weeks, and this plan of the pastor being the evangelist is being followed by all the churches. A noon-day mass meeting will be held each day in one of the down-town theatres, and large and far-reaching results are expected from this campaign for righteousness.

BIBLE SCHOOL LESSON

February 1.

Subject—The Unfriendly Neighbor.

Lesson—Luke 11: 1-13.

Golden Text—Ask and it shall be given you; seek and ye shall find; knock and it shall be opened unto you.—Luke 11: 9.

Time—Soon after the last event of last lesson. Probably about four months before the Crucifixion.

Place—In Perea.

Jesus has gone back to Perea for a few weeks of work. His coming crucifixion was beginning to weigh heavily upon him, and there was need of haste, for the fields were white unto harvest, and much work remained to be done. There are five important elements in the lesson.

1. "As he was praying." Jesus set the example of prayer. If he needed to pray, how much more need for others! Increasingly was Jesus found in communion with his Father as the work widened and his end approached.

2. "Lord, teach us to pray." The example of Jesus was making its impression upon the Disciples. At first, discipleship had meant loyalty to Jesus alone, even as John's disciples were subject to him. But gradually had come some comprehension of their relationship to the Father, and with it a consciousness of their own ignorance and their own inadequacy. One of the best evidences of the growing spirituality of the disciples is this desire to know how to pray effectively.

Note the simplicity, and yet the comprehensiveness of Jesus' reply. There must be recognition of God's fatherhood, and his holy characteristics. It was not an earthly kingdom but God's kingdom that was to claim their fealty. They were to pray for the supply of their needs, their daily sustenance, the forgiveness of their sins, and freedom from temptation. It was an inclusive prayer, suited to their needs as children groping yet somewhat in the dark.

3. "Because of his importunity." This is a lesson of contrast. The teaching is not that God is comparable to the unfriendly neighbor, but if such a neighbor will yield to persistent importunities under the circumstances set forth, how much more ready is the Father to lend a helping hand to any needy suppliant! Yet persistence in prayer is a virtue that will bring its own reward. Remember again Jacob's, "I will not let thee go, except thou bless me."

4. "Every one that asketh receiveth." The blessing is to him who not only asks, but seeks and knocks. There must be sincerity and determination of purpose when God is approached in supplication. Prayer, genuine, persistent prayer is the key that unlocks the storehouse of God. Prayer is communion, and manifold blessings will rest upon all who thus reveal their willingness to be the sons of God, for the corollary of Fatherhood is sonship.

5. "How much more." Note the fatherliness of God's answer to prayer. God is pictured as a father to the disciples. They knew the love of a human father that prompted him to give good gifts to his children. How much more was the Father in heaven ready to shower in gracious abundance heavenly blessings upon all those who would approach him in sonship! How few really put this teaching to the test! As a climax there came the promise of the Holy Spirit, an indwelling, abiding guest who would lead them into all truth.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR

February 1.

Topic—Christian Endeavor Progress. Mark 4: 26-32. (Christian Endeavor Day.)

It is a fitting time to take an account of stock as a C. E. Society, not merely to fill up the credit side of the ledger, but to take note of the debit side as well.

Is your Society growing in numbers and interest?

Are the Committees active in their respective jurisdictions?

Is the prayer meeting a live occasion, full of spiritual interest?

Are the members loyal to the church, and do they readily become workers in the meeting?

Is your Society doing anything worth while to win the community to the church and the kingdom?

Are the contributions to missions on the increase, and are steps being taken to develop interest in the foreign as well as the home field?

Is the outlook bright for the coming year?

Is the membership being recruited from time to time from the Associate list?

Prof. Allen C. Thomas of Haverford College, has just completed his School History of England, a companion piece to his popular history of the United States.

I. Gurney Lee recently conducted meetings at Hortonville, Indiana, and is now engaged in like service at Pleasant View, Indiana, in Westfield Quarterly Meeting.

Dr. D. W. Roberts, who was a dele-gate to the Student Volunteer Conven-

M. Davis Branon, for some time membership and social secretary of the Y. M. C. A. at Ottumwa, Iowa, an association with nearly one thousand members, has resigned that position in order that he may resume pastoral work in the Friends' Church. Hannah Pratt Jessup has a fine lecture on "Friends, Past and Present," which would be valuable for any meeting. It is described by those who have heard it as instructive and helpful, and it is hoped that many congregations will

WONDERED WHY

Found the Answer Was "Coffee"

Many pale, sickly persons wonder for years why they have to suffer so, and eventually discover that the drug—caffeine—in coffee is the main cause of the trouble.

"I was always very fond of coffee and drank it every day. I never had much flesh and often wondered why I was always so pale, thin and weak.

"About five years ago my health completely broke down and I was confined to my bed. My stomach was in such condition that I could hardly take sufficient nourishment to sustain life.

"During this time I was drinking coffee, didn't think I could do without it. "After awhile I came to the conclusion that coffee was hurting me, and decided to give it up and try Postum. When it was made right—dark and rich—I soon became very fond of it.

"In one week I began to feel better. I could eat more and sleep better. My sick headaches were less frequent, and within five months I looked and felt like a new being, headache spells entirely gone.

"My health continued to improve and today I am well and strong, weigh 148 lbs. I attribute my present health to the life-giving qualities of Postum."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

EFFICIENCY SECRETARY

Indiana Yearly Meeting last fall appointed a committee to consider the advisability of placing a General Secretary in the field to act as an efficiency man; some one who could help bring about better organization and more systematic efforts. This committee has carefully considered the question and with the co-operation of some of the leading committees of the Yearly Meeting, they were unanimous in selecting for the place, Ancil E. Ratliff, of Fairmount. He has already begun his work with very satisfactory results. We hope that Friends all over the Yearly Meeting will uphold him by their very best efforts and prayers.

On behalf of the committee,
ARTHUR M. CHARLES, Chairman.
EDITH J. HUNT, Secretary.

He Will Not Fail Thee

He will not fail thee—believe it still!
The waters may dry of the singing rill,
The sands of the desert stretch afar,
East and west, to the sunset bar:
Can He forget who hath never forgot?
The Lord who loveth thee slumbereth not;
Rest on that love, nor fear, nor fret,
Thou shalt see His great deliverance yet.

His promises fail not; day by day
Thou shalt find fresh strength for the onward way,
If only thy glance go up to Him,
As the journey winds through the shadows dim,
The fears that vexed thee shall pass and fade,
And nothing shall make thine heart afraid;
Anxious questionings and doubts shall cease,
For He shall keep thee in perfect peace.

He will not fail thee—nor count it true
'Tis only to trust Him the whole way through.
The prayer we win not, His plan may cross;
The gain we strive for be endless loss;
We cannot judge, and we cannot know,
But oh! we can let the worries go,
And look for the calm that He gives instead—
The trusting heart hath no room for dread.

We toil and struggle for many an aim
Who are slow to trust in His blessed Name,
The waters of earthly comfort fail,
And all things change—'tis the old, old tale;
But summer or winter, heat or cold,
Still doth the love of the Lord enfold,
In the darkest hour, when thine heart doth quail,
Be strong—His compassions never fail.

The World in Action

A Church Challenge. R. A. Long, of Kansas City, has challenged his Church, the Disciples, to raise $4,000,000.00 for education, pledging himself to pay an additional one million dollars in case they succeed.

Prophetic Conference. The International Prophetic Conference will meet in Chicago, February 24-27, under the auspices of the Moody Bible Institute. A large number of the most prominent religious workers will be on the program.

Commission on Evangelism. The National Federated Evangelistic Committee has been merged into the Federal Council of Churches, and W. E. Biederwolf, who was the Committee's secretary, now becomes the general secretary of the Commission on Evangelism of the Council.

Women's Foreign Mission Federation. The various foreign mission boards of women in the United States have recently formed a federation of these boards, seventeen denominations being thus far represented. Thus are the women leading in the cause of Christian unity.

Vocation Day. The Presbyterian Churches have set apart one day in February to be known as "Vocation Day," the purpose of which is to assist the young people in an intelligent dedication of their lives to some sort of useful endeavor in the kingdom of Christ.

Chosen Students. The seventh annual Conference of Church Workers in State Universities will be held at Indiana University, Bloomington, Indiana, February 3-5. This Conference represents 144,000 chosen students and a number of prominent educators will be heard on the program.

Hospital Service. A group of Protestant Churches in Cleveland have a carefully worked-out plan to minister to the spiritual life of the patients in the three hospitals of their neighborhood. Each hospital is visited each week by a Protestant minister. The hospital authorities welcome the men and the patients are uniformly grateful. Each man goes in the name of all the Protestant Churches.

Reorganizing Mission Work in Mexico. At the meeting of the foreign mission secretaries at Garden City, week before last, the proposition was made that this is the providential time to reorganize mission work in Mexico upon a unified basis. Robert E. Speer proposed that theological schools in Mexico should be consolidated, that local schools should be combined whenever located in the same community, and that the several missionary presses should be put into the same establishment. A committee was appointed to elaborate the details.

"Billy" Sunday in Pittsburg. The "Billy" Sunday evangelistic campaign now going on in Pittsburg is undoubtedly the greatest single revival effort this country has yet known. With exceedingly rare exceptions, the evangelical Churches are all back of the movement. During the first three weeks, approximately 500,000 have attended the meeting. On the 18th, there were 15,000 men gathered in each of two meetings. About 5,000 persons had accepted Christ by the end of the third week. The religious papers of Pittsburg say that never before have so many people been talking about religion.

Home Mission Council. At the recent meeting of the Home Mission Council, the federation of all home mission bodies in the country, the proposition was endorsed to employ an agent to study immigration conditions on behalf of all the Churches. The subject of adjustment among the denominations in home mission fields is to be referred to a commission of ten members, who will report a year hence on a scheme of national co-operation. It is hoped that a satisfactory adjustment can be made soon of the competition between denominational Sabbath School missionaries and missionaries of the American Sunday School Union.

The Church Must Be United

We have said recently that the Church must be progressive, that it must be efficient and that it must be spiritual. The unity of the Church is a no less vital element in the problem of ideal sainthood. Other denominations are bound together more or less closely by credal ties, but no creed has ever characterized the Quaker polity. From the beginning Friends have appealed to a higher standard of Christian unity, the unity of a common faith in the ability and readiness of Christ to reveal Himself by the power of the Spirit in every human life that has a mind open to receive Him, and to transform that life into a working Christian organism for the enlightenment and help of others.

Ecclesiastical ordinations have ever been discarded as formal ties of fellowship, no less than as essentials to salvation, while the unity of the Spirit has always been emphasized as the ideal bond of fellowship in our denominational polity. Our position has been somewhat anomalous, in that while proclaiming a message whose catholicity ought apparently to have appealed to all men, we have become in a measure the victims of our own liberality, by giving loose rein to an individualism that at times has almost threatened the autonomy of our organization. Possibly we have yet to face the serious problem of harmonizing our individualistic ideals to a practical, cohesive, workable mechanism, wherein is made the attempt to co-ordinate divisive and unsympathetic elements.

Naturally no organization, much less the Church of Christ, can thrive in the soil of suspicion and positive antagonism. Rancor and jealousy and rivalry do not win men to Christ. There may be competition in discipleship, but it must be the competition of love.

It is quite apparent that unity in thought and in opinion cannot be made the test of denominational fealty. The Church that expects its membership to agree in judgment even about the things of the Spirit and about the procedure which the Church is to follow will be grievously disappointed. It is when diverse opinion grows into open or even secret antagonism, and produces suspicion which breaks the bonds of fellowship and destroys that unity in the Spirit which is so essential, that weakness comes upon the Church.

There must be unity in Spirit, unity in faith, unity in the fundamental elements of salvation, unity in fellowship, unity in purpose to reveal Jesus Christ both in the message and by example, or there can be no cohesive, effective organization that crystallizes religious life and service into one collective and concrete whole, applying itself to the task of community and world evangelization. In the face of diverse opinion and judgment the Christian graces of patience and sympathy and love must still guard the citadel of the heart and mind. In the presence even of criticism, suspicion and bitterness must be kept under as in the case of any other sin.

It has been to the shame and the hurt of the Christian Church in all the centuries since its establishment, that so often it has seemed unable to discuss even the great and fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith, without developing bitterness and acrimony. Suspicion and backbiting are poisons to the Christian life, for which there is no antidote except the removal of the cause. The sin of unbelief is no greater than the sin of angry contention or of un-Christian controversy. Both can only be cured in one way, the way in which all sin is cured.

A situation has developed among Friends within recent years that should be the object of solicitude to all who want to see the Church prosper. We are not concerned herein with the merits of doctrinal controversies. Our own faith in the fundamentals of our great truths is too well established to be shaken, but that question is not the burden of our concern in this article. Perhaps it has been unavoidable that divergent opinions should exist. It is a situation more or less common to all denominations. Our concern is that our divergencies of doctrine shall not be allowed to mar our fellowship. In the face of disagreements, there is a higher law of unity, the unity of the Spirit, the unity of purpose to conquer the world of sin, which if allowed to operate will do far more to illuminate and dissolve differences of opinion and judgment than all the discussions will ever do. There can be love and the spirit of unity even in the presence of non-agreement, and they who transgress this border line,

It is our profound conviction that if the discussion of our divergencies of opinion and judgment were taken from the public forum to the council chambers of friendly converse, where in the spirit of prayer and fraternal regard, there could be the touch of mind with mind and heart with heart and life with life, differences in large measure would disappear and a great charity would bring all into a common melting pot from which would emerge a unified and baptized Church, endued with power for its mission of world redemption. Cross firing at long distances is not conducive either to harmony or to efficiency. Debate is proper for the forum of the lyceum and the arena of politics and government, but friendly, sympathetic counsel should ever grace the hearthstone of the Christian Church. The differentiation over much of the spirit of liberalism on the one hand and of ultra orthodoxy on the other tends to distraction and a waste of spiritual power, that is disheartening in an age when the whole world is waiting to receive the saving message of Jesus Christ.

Quakerism cannot be sectionalized except to its own hurt and the hurt of the tenets for which it stands. Neither can it break up into theological camps without ultimate injury to its own autonomy and the weakening of its powers of Christian service. In our judgment, Quaker legalism is not so important as the Quaker spirit that manifests itself in a passion for souls and the uplift of humanity everywhere.

The time is overdue for the Society of Friends to set its house in order for a forward look along lines of evangelistic endeavor, that it may become the evangel of a gospel of Christian living and of Christian service, characterized by Christian sympathy and a love that is heavenly, which will grip the lives of men and women of this age and turn them face about for the Kingdom.

The Power of the Righteous Life

An exchange recently said, "He who would bring fire from Heaven must have an Elijah by the altar." Men and women of faith, who dare to be obedient even in the face of danger, never fail to make their impress upon their community. They are the type of heroes in every crisis that marks the march of humanity upward. The miracles of earth are the product of intensive spirituality.

He who would be God's workman, needs first to tarry by the brook to receive nourishment from the hand of the Lord, needs to fellowship with human need to appreciate more fully the Divine filling, needs to brave the opposition of sin to enjoy the blessedness of protection, needs to face the mighty tests of faith at the altars of Jehovah to realize in all its glory the presence of the Divine Father.

Obedient discipleship is the measure of the toilers in God's great workshop, who count for most in the building. The great men and women of the future who have most to do in bringing the blessings of a Christian civilization into the dark places of earth, whether at home or abroad, will be men and women of prophetic vision and of magnetic faith, whose lives are consecrated to the service of Jesus Christ.

It is the spiritually minded who can do the best things for the life of any community, who are the hope of any neighborhood, who are the salt of the earth. Youth, ambitious to fill a large place in the world of action, needs first to be endued with power from on high. They who tarry by the altars of God are they to whom is transmitted the power of omnipotence in winning needy humanity for the righteous life.

BY PROF. ELBERT RUSSELL

The Meaning of the Reformation

To understand the Protestant Reformation it is necessary to go back to the fifth century A. D., when the Teutonic tribes of northern Europe overran and destroyed the Roman Empire of the west. In that century Latin civilization was decadent. There was little vitality left in its intellectual, municipal or imperial institutions. Only the church was vigorous and capable. In consequence men turned to the church for help in their civic and intellectual as well as in their religious needs. In many places the bishops assumed the management of the cities, dispensed charity, and promoted education. Then, when the Northern Barbarians—the Goths, Vandals, Franks, Lombards and Saxons—broke through the weak military shell of the Empire, the church was the only institution that weathered the storm.

The earliest of the Teutonic invaders were Christians—of the Arian type—and in some measure respected the church. The bishop of Rome repeatedly saved the city from capture when the military failed. He bought off Alaric, the Goth, once and persuaded Attila, the Hun, to spare the city. When finally Alaric, and afterward Genseric, the Vandal, sacked the city, the churches afforded the only asylums from their savagery. Thus the church became in the thought of the age the ark in which a remnant of the old order was to be saved. Only that part of the learning, political ideals and religion of the Greco-Roman world which found refuge in the church was preserved amid the floods of barbarism that overwhelmed the Empire. The church was to them the visible and stable embodiment of the only social order—the city of God—that could replace the perished Roman state.

It was amid these conditions that Augustine of Hippo formulated for the church a doctrine of authority commensurate with its task and actual power. The conception of the exclusive prerogatives of the church and its bishops had been of slow growth, but the conditions of the fifth century and Augustine's temperament and personal experiences led to the form it assumed and held during the Middle Ages. Augustine was a man of strong passions and weak will. He was gifted with a mind keen and critical but slow to reach positive convictions. He had a Roman's reverence for an effective institution. After a checkered moral and intellectual career, he came in the prime of life to the church as a refuge from his own vacillations of opinion and weakness of will and found quiet by surrendering himself unquestioningly to an institution accredited by its own achievements and power. He formulated his experience and that of his age into system of doctrine. Man was unable to know truth or right of himself. The church was the repository of revealed truth, the divinely appointed agent of salvation. Only by accepting its doctrines and obeying its moral code unquestioningly could one reach the sure knowledge of truth and righteousness. Only through its sacraments and fellowship was there salvation. The Scriptures themselves could have no authority for him, if the church did not vouch for them.

Thus the exigencies of a transitional age were formulated into an eternal ecclesiastical order, and the experiences of an unusual man were made the rule of all religious life, in the doctrine of the external authority of the church as an institution divinely endowed to supersede the mind and conscience of mankind and to mediate between God and men. This doctrine, although it took definite form under the influence of a temporary condition of society, became the ruling theory of the whole Medieval period, because the new peoples, who conquered the Roman Empire and later built up the great nations of western Europe, found Augustine's experience fairly representative of their own situation.

Those Teutonic peoples which settled in Italy, Gaul, Spain and Britain found themselves in contact with the remains of a civilization which they realized was superior to their own. The church, the school, and the empire were better than anything they could of themselves produce. They felt the lure of higher culture which they found almost wholly in the keeping of the church. They wished to reason like the Greek philosophers, to write like the classical authors, to rule men in the interests of order and justice like the Romans, and to live and worship according to the Christian ideal. But when they tried these things, they found themselves incapable. They were like children taking first lessons in arithmetic, who never know whether their calculations are correct until they have looked up the answer in the text-book. Their work may seem correct to themselves, but if the book does not agree with their own results, they are ready to acknowledge that they must be wrong.

Thus the Teutonic races went to school to the church in order to appropriate its treasures of ancient civilization. Since their minds were untrained, they were inexperienced in Christian living, and their consciences were influenced by heathen ideas and customs. They learned quickly to distrust their own reason and conscience, as guides, and came to accept, on its bare authority, the dogmas of the church and the counsels of its confessional as final proof of what was true and right. Thus the doctrine prevailed that in matters religious the individual has no capacity to get or to comprehend truth for himself; that he must accept the teaching of the church, no matter how false it may seem to his own judgment nor how wrong it may seem to his own conscience.

We must not underestimate the value of the educational work which the church did by virtue of this authority. During the Middle Ages it clarified the mind and Christianized the customs and institutions of Europe in a large degree. The child race, like the individual child, must needs receive its first knowledge of the more abstract and remote things on external authority. This process, however, developed the capabilities of the Germanic peoples. As society became Christianized, they found the gap closing up between the voice of conscience and the teachings of the church.

Scholasticism was a system of thought which took the dogmas of the church as premises, just as mathematical reasoning starts with certain axioms. "I believe in order to know" was its motto. Gradually this mental exercise developed men's confidence in their ability to reason correctly, and bold spirits now and then ventured to attempt the proof of the church's dogmas. Of course, if their reasoning failed to reach the church's teaching as its conclusion, they doubted the correctness of their reasoning. In the course of his education a child normally reaches a time when he gets confidence in his own powers. If he has worked a problem repeatedly and tested and verified his work in every possible way, he will finally question the accuracy of the text-book, if it does not agree with his own answer. He will trust his own powers against teacher and text, when he comes to maturity. Likewise, it was inevitable that in the course of the education of the Teutonic races, men would begin to say, "My reasoning is correct; the church must be wrong."

When such cases first occurred, the church, serenely confident of the truth of its dogmas and confident of its power to convince men, would set forth a champion to reason with and refute the heretic. In the earlier centuries this was usually successful. But there came a time when the church found it impossible to maintain its authority by conviction and fell back upon the demand for obedience regardless of personal convictions. If this was refused, the inquisition and secular power were called in to enforce upon the dissenter's body that authority that could no longer exercise over his mind and conscience by the logic of its scholars, the holiness of its saints, or the prestige of its antiquity and visible power. Since it was possible in this way to suppress the dissent of isolated individuals, the church maintained for centuries its claim to supersede the inward guides of the human soul.

The Protestant Reformation marks the time when the Teutonic peoples as a whole came of age and threw off the arbitrary tutelage of the Roman church. Luther's conscience was outraged by Tetzel's unblushing sale of indulgences and his blasphemous assurances of their efficacy. At first Luther had no doubt that the church would side with him; but when it did not, he resolved to set his conscience against the authority of the church. The Reformation came, because half of Europe sided with him. The fundamental issue, Luther stated clearly enough before the Diet at Worms. The church authorities had branded certain statements in his writings as false and heretical and demanded that, because they said so, he should retract them. His answer was:

"Unless I am convinced by Scripture or plain reasons (since I believe neither Pope nor councils unsupported, it being evident that they have often erred and contradicted themselves), I am convinced by the Scripture I have cited, and my conscience is bound in the word of God; I cannot and will not retract anything, since it is never safe nor right to act contrary to one's conscience."

The real issue was whether the paramount authority is outside of or within the man; whether his supreme obligation is to God as revealed in the church or some other external institution or person, or to God as He reveals Himself within the soul. The Reformation substituted the inward for the outward authority.

How to be an Overcomer

BY JOHN S. KIMBER

My hope is to make clear to my readers seven wonderful points in the 12th chapter of Paul's letter to the Romans. It is to be supposed that the apostle was addressing these words to Christians. He calls them "brethren." They were therefore, "justified by faith," and had "peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ." This peace is the effect of the new birth, and it should be a matter of note with us all.

My first subject is that of JUSTIFICATION. Our justification should be definite, consciously and continuously recognized and realized, and never doubted.

To people of this Christian standing Paul appeals "by the mercies of God," that they present their bodies "a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God," which, he says, is a "reasonable service." This is the step of the Christian's CONSECRATION. Oh, but it is a reasonable service; how unreasonable it is not to do so! What joy follows our yielding, what sorrow comes upon us if we do not! How we grow in grace by this course, if we pursue it; how we blur and eventually lose our justification if we persist in having our own way and do not fully yield to God!

Absolute consecration upon our part, brings to us from God the blessing of SANCTIFICATION. This is God's seal upon our surrender, just as our conscious justification was the seal of our sorrow for, and abandonment of, sin. The altar sanctifies the gift and whatsoever touches the altar is "holy." "In whom also after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that holy Spirit of promise." The blessing, like all spiritual gifts, is taken first by faith; but as "faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen," the blessing at once becomes a fact and a "deep settled peace" soon pervades the soul which doubtless finds outlet sooner or later in a heart well nigh bursting with love and joy and tears of gratitude, with or without much outward expression. But this is more than a blessing, it is in a very real sense the Blesser Himself. Does Paul refer to this when he says, "My little children of whom I travail in birth again until Christ be formed in you?" And Jesus said, "It is expedient for you that I go away; for if I go not away (He) will not come unto you; but if I go away I will send Him unto you." He shall take of mine and reveal it unto you. How it will illumine the Scriptures, to have the Author of them (God's Holy Spirit) thus abiding in our hearts! "I have many things to say unto you but ye are not able to bear them now, but when He the Spirit of Truth is come" He will "bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you."

TRANSFORMATION is, of course, a part of sanctification, but there is a sense, I think, in which it is sanctification in perpetuity, "that ye may prove what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God." For sanctification is both instantaneous and gradual; an act of God,—followed by the growth of a lifetime upon our part. "We all with open face beholding, as in a glass, the glory of the Lord." This makes a true separation from the world, and a constant "renewing of the Holy Ghost."

Then HUMILIATION, that no man think of Himself "more highly than he ought to think." It is said by Andrew Murray, I believe, that "humility is the soil in which every other Christian grace will grow." Another says, "Christ was an unsurpassed teacher and many were those who resorted to Him for instruction. But when He wanted through His servant to teach humility, the ordinary terms of grammar would not do, and a new degree of comparison had to be introduced—little, less, least, and 'less than the least'."

Next CONSOLIDATION. How blessed to be a member of His body! And how blessed to work in harmony with the other members, our brothers and sisters in Christ! "For whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven," said Jesus, "the same is my brother, and sister, and mother." I have heard a sweet lesson here from the boards of the Tabernacle which were all the same size, and when taken down could be put up in any order. They were held together not only by outward supports, such as our sectarian views, as it were, but also by a hidden bar which shot through the heart "from end to end," and though unseen by human eye, bound them firmly together. Just so the children of the King are held together by ties of Blood Divine, forming a closer relationship than that of earthly kin.

Then comes the injunction, the crowning step, "Let love be WITHOUT DISSIMULATION. That is without hypocrisy, hence sincere. Paul more fully describes this Divine love in the 13th chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians, to which it would be well here to refer.

Beautiful and practical advice now fills the rest of this wonderful chapter. It speaks concerning Christian charity and burning zeal; joy and patience; hope and prayer; hospitality, forbearance and sympathy; condescension, forgiveness, honesty and peace. A mighty appeal is made to the Christian to leave his case in the hands of the Lord in these words, "Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath: for it is written, Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord. Therefore, if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink; for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head." And now come the closing words, "Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good." And it seems as if the seven steps of our lesson formed a ladder that will lead us up to the place of the Overcomer. Please ascend them, dear reader, until through absolute consecration and humiliation thou art transformed into His image, and with a heart made perfect in love towards God and towards His children, thou livest daily the life of an overcomer; abhorring "that which is evil," cleaving "to that which is good."

A Great Church Movement

Editor American Friend:

I wonder how many of our members know of the fine spirit of co-operative work now being engaged in by the Disciples of Christ? This Church has entered upon a nation-wide campaign for six million dollars for missionary enlargement and college endowment. It is the plan to give two and one-half million dollars to the missionary and benevolent boards, and to divide the other three and one-half millions among ten colleges conducted under their auspices. This is an active, wide-awake Church, with a membership loyal to one another, and a program that fires the imagination. This movement is backed by business men and there is every prospect that they will be successful.

This is a fine object lesson for us. As an American Church we Friends have never demonstrated what we can do, for we have never joined together in a serious trial. Selfishness, provincialism, inertia,—if we could only sweep such hindrances out of the way and unite on a higher plane for the Kingdom! How many Friends are ready?

A Monthly Meeting Chronicle

BY JUNIUS JUNIOR

III.

Slow Valley Monthly Meeting convened at the usual hour for its March meeting in 1913, on the 8th. The day was windy but clear. The attendance was encouraging, fifty-nine persons being present, including five young men and six young women. During the opening moments there was a silence so profound that to the casual onlooker it might have been the silence of death. But the spiritually minded would have realized that a considerable portion of the gathered company were praying with an unction that had not always characterized the communion of the members at Newtown.

Finally the silence was broken by a hymn and two or three brief prayers from the body of the meeting. Two of the men, including the pastor, and two of the women gave brief exhortations, followed by the resident minister, who had been visiting in another part of the state, and who expressed his thankfulness that he had been permitted to return to his home meeting which he appreciated more and more as he grew older. After a song, another period of silence was followed by the reading of the opening minute by the Clerk. The minutes of the February session were read and approved. Perhaps it was the announcement of a special order that had been responsible for the increased attendance. But not even the unusual program had sufficed to interest half of the membership. The others were scattered throughout the city and the surrounding country, busied about their multitudinous home and business cares, content to let the faithful few go through the forms of attending to the business of the Church.

Some routine matters claimed attention. The delegates to the Quarterly Meeting held in a neighboring town announced that only one of the number had been able to attend. A committee was appointed to investigate the cost of repairs to the meeting house, including the leak in the roof, and report at the April Meeting. A certificate of membership was read for a young man who had recently come to Newtown, and certificates were granted to the Wharton family who had joined the Methodists as the result of the recent revival in that congregation. One man asked to withdraw his membership without assigning a reason therefor, and the overseers were directed to report on the case a month hence.

The Clerk then suggested that the special order of the day be taken up. There was some fidgeting upon the front seat, where the retired farmer sat, and a few of the women had an uneasy look. In the absence of any fixed program of consideration, many eyes were turned to the merchant who had asked for the special order at the February meeting.

Apparently somewhat embarrassed at the responsibility which he had taken upon himself, the merchant arose and said that he felt every member present was as much interested in the welfare of Slow Valley Meeting as he was, and that there was no more responsibility upon him to find a remedy for existing conditions than upon others. He appreciated deeply the devotion and consecration of the faithful few in the meeting, who attended all services with patient regularity. He was not in the role of a critic and had not meant to disturb the equanimity of the congregation. He had spoken somewhat upon impulse two months before, but from a conviction that the situation in the meeting was not what it should be. Since then he had had the burden of the subject upon his heart increasingly and had been looking into conditions somewhat carefully and prayerfully. He had found that so far as he could ascertain, fully 75 of the members had not attended any service of the Church for more than three years; that there were scores of families both in the city and the country, within easy reach of their meeting house, who were not going to Church anywhere, and apparently no effort was being made to reach them. Situated as they were near the western edge of the city and away from any other Church, a responsibility rested upon them to minister to the needs of these families.

He felt that another problem was that of the young people of the meeting, who not only needed to be encouraged, but should be organized in some definite way for Christian service. A third problem related to the finances. He found that the bulk of the contributions to the meeting were coming from seven families, while eighteen families had not paid anything to the Church the past year. Several other families had given only a minimum amount, and in a desultory way that meant nothing to the work and interest of the congregation.

"I cannot feel," he said in conclusion, "that we can afford to remain an exclusive body of Christian believers, when there is so much to be done, which I believe God is calling us to do. If we have been doing well, we can do better. If we have enjoyed our circle of fellowship, we ought to be constantly enlarging it, both for the sake of others and for our own. We ought to take steps somehow to find out what we can do to interest our own members, which is fundamental to our growth and activity, after which we will be in position to reach out a helping hand to others."

A running discussion followed for half an hour, some defending existing policies, others endorsing the idea of looking forward to better things. The young teacher made a vigorous speech in behalf of the youth of the meeting, and felt that the Church should set about organizing them upon lines that would appeal to them as young people. The retired farmer was more tractable, but still inclined to feel that conditions were not so bad as some would have them believe. One woman thought there ought to be a Home Mission Committee, while another felt if all would only live up to the doctrines as held by Friends they would be fulfilling their mission satisfactorily. A young woman urged the need of a study class to read up on Friends history and beliefs, while a man said he thought that in some way the Church ought to be looking after the foreign colony in the city, which was being added to every few days.

The resident minister could not quite understand what had happened so suddenly to make so many of the members restless. One would gather that Slow Valley Meeting was not doing anything. He concluded by cautioning the members to move slowly in accepting innovations, and exhorted them to continue in the old faith and not be contaminated by the practices of those outside, who did not have as high a conception of religious truth as had been revealed to Friends.

It was the farmer who had endorsed the plea of the business man a month before, who at last brought order out of chaos. The discussion had gone on for an hour. The needs of the members, the young people, the children, the need of a better financial system, of more spirituality, of standing by our doctrines, the needs of the foreigners, the non-Churchgoer, the poor and the outcast, the need of doing something to stop the growing influence of the saloon and lawlessness in the city, had all been referred to. Several of the more conservative had cautioned against going beyond the sphere of the Church into the field of socialism and politics; others had emphasized the fact that we are a peculiar people, and should maintain our distinguishing testimonies, but no one had anything definite to propose.

It remained for this farmer, practical, hard-headed but warm of heart, to make a definite proposition. In a five-minute talk he directed attention to the really important matters, and with a distinctness that was startling emphasized the fact that the meeting must first set its own house in order before it could minister to the world about them. He proposed that a committee of seven on the state of the Church should be named with instructions to look into conditions in the meeting, taking into account the many suggestions that had been made in the discussion, and report their conclusions to the meeting next month. Incidentally he expressed the conviction that while it was getting late in the season, Slow Valley Meeting and the entire community needed a revival, and hoped that the pastor and the Evangelistic Committee would take that into consideration.

The proposal for the appointment of a committee was finally approved, despite a negative expression on the part of three or four. Our business friend headed the list, and many were rejoiced that the farmer and the young teacher had a place on the committee. The concluding minute was read, and a prayer by the pastor sent the congregation out more thoughtful about their responsibilities to each other, to the community and to God than they had been in many years. The leaven was working, and slowly a vision of new opportunity for Slow Valley Meeting was beginning to dawn in many hearts.

Friends and the Student Volunteer Convention

BY HENRY J. CADBURY

(Although we gave space to this convention last week, we are glad to give place for another account, owing to the importance of the subject.—The Editor.)

Every four years, that is, once in the normal career of each college student, the Student Volunteer Movement of the United States and Canada holds a Convention. This Convention is neither political nor military. It transacts no "business" in the technical sense—it passes no motions, it adopts no resolutions or minutes. It chooses no officials—except that Jesus Christ is chosen by each member his Master and Lord. And yet it is a most important gathering. The great Conventions of Nashville and Rochester, and those before them, each marked a distinct stage in the progress of the cause of foreign missions. This year the Convention recently held at Kansas City, from December 31st to January 4th, probably will outdo them in permanent results.

The plans for the Convention were well laid. The citizens of Kansas City showed themselves the acme of hospitality. The largest hall in the city was rented by the citizens of a single line of business, and generous funds were provided and thousands of homes were opened for the reception of the visiting delegates. The latter numbered about four thousand and represented more than 800 colleges and special training schools. There were three two-hour sessions each day.

These meetings, though conducted in the form of religious services, constituted a strong concentrated course of instruction on the subject of missions. Brief but able addresses were given by experts bringing before the delegates the various aspects of the broad problem of missions—such as the Mohammedan world, Latin America, unoccupied fields, the preparation of the missionary, forces to be wielded in the world's evangelization, and the strategy of foreign missions.

The longest address was a most informing account given by John R. Mott of his recent trip through Russia, Southern Asia, Manchuria, Korea and Japan. In all these countries he found an extraordinary and growing interest of college students in Christianity. The door is being opened for the gospel in a most providential manner and this urgent situation gave to the Convention as a keynote the thought: "The harvest truly is plenteous, but the laborers are few. Pray ye therefore the Lord of the Harvest that he send forth laborers into his harvest."

Attending the Kansas City Convention were about seventy-five Quaker delegates, from many places, from Maine to California. Bryn Mawr, Earlham, Guilford, Haverford, Nebraska Central, Penn, Swarthmore, Whittier, Wilmington College and Friends University were represented, and Friends were in the delegations from several other colleges. Under the hospitable roof of the local Friends Church all these persons were brought together and old friendships were renewed and new ones formed. An informal reception and supper was given by the Kansas City Friends on Thursday, and on the following afternoon, according to the general program of the Convention, each denomination met to consider its own missionary problems.

The meeting was directed by Charles E. Tebbetts of Richmond, Indiana, Secretary of the American Friends Board of Foreign Missions. He outlined the work of the Board in its various fields. He showed that the volunteers for foreign service were more readily found than the means for their support—a situation which puts a great responsibility on the home church to greatly increase their contributions to missions in the coming campaign. A roll call of the delegates indicated that fifteen or twenty of the Friends present had already volunteered. Arthur Chilson and his wife and Jefferson W. Ford were called upon to speak as missionaries home on furlough. Charles Tebbetts spoke on the qualifications needed in missionaries, and Henry J. Cadbury on the question, What constitutes a call to the foreign field? Reference was made to the work of Ohio, New England and Philadelphia Friends not under the Five Years Meeting. From the Philadelphia Association several representatives were present.

The Responsibility of Fathers

Another element tending toward the break-up of home life is the failure on the part of fathers to realize their full responsibility for their children. There are multitudes of fathers today who are members of Christian Churches, and without doubt Christian men, who seem to think that their responsibility ends when they have provided for the physical needs of their children, given them a good education, provided a certain amount of recreation, and occasionally acted as moral policemen and executioners. Such a conception is as pernicious as it is false. Under the Hebrew economy, which was divine, and the foundation of the Christian, fathers were responsible for the religious training of their children. No man can neglect this responsibility without the running of grave risks. Moreover, when it is recognized and fulfilled, a man is compelled to give time and attention to every side of the being of his children. This means also living very near to the actual life of the child, gaining its confidence by being interested in all that interests it. I am perfectly familiar with the fact that there are fathers who take a certain kind of religious interest in their children which drives the children away from God. This is, indeed, another cause of the break-up of home. Where the father is himself living in close fellowship with God, and loves his children first and last and all the time with the love which is shed abroad in his own heart from such fellowship, and enters into all their lives with the pure and tender sympathy which develops and fulfills all the highest things in their lives, wherever this is so, home remains strong, and abides through all the years the most blessed and potent factor for good in the lives of the children.—G. Campbell Morgan.

Current Items of Interest to Friends

CALIFORNIA YEARLY MEETING

Golden Wedding—Addison W. and Rebecca S. Naylor celebrated their golden wedding anniversary at their home in Berkeley, California, January 9th. About four hundred guests were received during the afternoon and evening. Old friends, relations from various parts of the state, associates of Mr. Naylor in business, employees of the First National Bank, which he founded more than twenty years ago, officers and employees of the Berkeley National Bank, and other friends of the couple in university and church circles were included among the callers. Four generations were included in the receiving line. A number of valuable gifts were presented, including a handsome English chime clock of solid mahogany, standing nine feet in height. An elaborate supper was served in a marquee erected on the grounds of the Naylor residence.

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING

Muncie—Surely the Lord has been blessing the Friends' meeting in Muncie the past year, both in numbers and spiritual blessing. The Bible school has outgrown the large room used for that purpose, but the most encouraging thing is the quick desire of those that came into the school to become Christians and to unite with Friends. The teachers with their very able superintendent, Joseph A. Goddard, and pastor, Daisy D. Barr, have unceasingly pressed home the necessity of every one becoming Christians. There is hardly one in the school that has not accepted Christ. It is not an unusual thing to have conversions in the classes during the study hour.

Two hundred and sixteen accessions the past year speaks well for the Muncie Meeting. Daisy D. Barr has a place in Muncie not only among Friends, but in a number of organizations. She is now president of the Humane Society; president of the Friendly Inn organization; vice-president of the Y. W. C. A., and is on the board of the Children's Home. It was through her efforts that the Y. W. C. A. and Friendly Inn were made possible. The Y. W. is the result of a little parlor meeting with a few girls from the Friends' Church at her home to organize a social betterment class, which afterwards grew into the Y. W., with a membership of over seven hundred, and a home costing $35,000.00 that is a credit to any city.

The morning and evening meetings at Muncie are well attended. The sermons of the morning meetings are directed almost entirely to the church membership, while the evening discourses are on the evangelistic line. We believe that the success is largely due to these evening services, as a great many people that are not members attend these meetings. The midweek meeting is also well attended. Hardly a Monthly Meeting has been held the past year without one or more requests for membership, but at last Monthly Meeting one hundred and ten names by request and letter were accepted. A large number of these had never known Friends until recently. Some came from other denominations. But one of the things to rejoice over is the return of those that had once been Friends, and had drifted away into other churches, while some were not attending church at all. We think it is time to send out the call "Come Home." We are having entire families of this sort, and many others are saying they were reared as Friends, but had drifted away at a time when the Friends did not offer the opportunity to develop their talents that other churches offered.

During the past year the enrollment of Friends' Bible School at Muncie reached four hundred and thirty-seven, an increase over the previous year of ninety-seven. There was an average attendance of two hundred and fifty-three, an increase of sixty-three. There were total collections of $424.21, an increase of $31.46. The largest attendance was three hundred and fifty-four, on October 12; the smallest, one hundred and twenty-one, on March 23. Twenty-two prizes were given during the year for regular attendance. Sixty-six united with the Church from the Bible School.

New Castle—Dalton H. Lewis and the Friends' congregation were highly pleased with the success which attended their "Get Together" services conducted last week. There was a large attendance each evening and plenty of fine spirit has been shown. Preceding the meetings, a whirlwind canvass of the membership was made with two teams in automobiles. The purpose was to give a personal invitation to attend the "Get Together" meeting. Quite an interest is being manifested by people who are not in the habit of attending church.

At the men's meeting in Castle Hall, the afternoon of January 18th, Dalton H. Lewis gave the address on "The World Needs Men." He commended the management for its stand in behalf of the moral betterment of the city, and promised his support to the meetings.

IOWA YEARLY MEETING

Minneapolis, Minnesota—The following officers and teachers of the Minneapolis Friends' Sunday-school were elected for the ensuing year: Oscar F. Symonds, superintendent; May Rogers, secretary; and Benjamin Webb, Samuel Haworth, Elizabeth Thompson, Edward Jones, Elma Jones, Evelyn Haworth, Edgar Worral, Mayme Davis, Edith Jones, Bertha Symonds and Elizabeth Angell, teachers. A decided increase in membership is a noteworthy and most encouraging feature of our church activity.

The Minneapolis Monthly Meeting has appointed an "Efficiency Committee" as a definite part of the church organization. This committee, composed of seven members, is to act with the regular standing committees in an advisory capacity, and, when deemed advisable, to assist in carrying out plans and suggestions. The organization of this committee is an outgrowth of the first meeting of the "Quakerism Study Class," when the pastor, Samuel L. Haworth, discussed in an able and stirring address, "Our Opportunity in Minneapolis." The new committee is one step toward the discovery and use of this opportunity. The members are J. H. Stuart, Chairman; Clarkson Lindley, Howard Stout, Oscar Symonds, Alice Webb, Edith Jones and Anne Howard.

Des Moines—The Men's Brotherhood of the First Friends' Church in Des Moines, held their regular meeting on the evening of the 12th instant, to which they invited the ladies. After the business session, they debated the question of "Woman Suffrage." At the close of the debate refreshments were served. A social time was enjoyed by all.

Indianola—On Thursday evening, January 15th, an interesting and helpful program was given at the Friends' Church, after which the audience was invited to the parsonage, where sandwiches, pickles, cocoa, coffee and wafers were served to one hundred and twenty-five. All enjoyed a pleasant evening. An address was given on the "Relation of Church and Sunday-school," by Jesse Eno, Superintendent of the school. "Home Department Work" was discussed by Mrs. Charles Allen. "What the C. E. is to the Church" was considered by Mrs. Leona Champlin. "A Review of Last Year's C. E. Work and the Outlook for the New Year" was given by Frank Whitelock, president of the C. E. "How May We be a Missionary Church" was the topic treated by Mrs. Lydia Jones. "Foreign Missions" was considered by Mrs. Edd White, and "Home Missions" by Mrs. W. L. Hunnicutt. "The Mother's Part in Mission Work" was the subject discussed by Mrs. Henry Watland, and "Items of Interest from the Immigrant" by Glen Smith. "Responsibility of Members in Regard to Monthly Meeting" by Henry Watland, Clerk of Monthly Meeting; "Statistics from our Local Church the Past Year," by Mrs. Al. Morris, and "A Vision of the Future," by Tom Coffin, closed the discussion. We have a splendid Sunday-school Superintendent, who though busy as clerk of the court, spends a great deal of time and energy for the school, and it has grown from an average of sixty the past year to one hundred and twenty-five now. There are two organized adult Bible classes. The young people's class with the pastor as teacher, has an enrollment of thirty-four, with an average attendance of twenty-three in December.

NEBRASKA YEARLY MEETING

Grant, Nebraska—The Friends' Meeting at this place though small, is in as good condition as could be expected, considering the fact that some of our best working members have moved away within the past year. Our new church building, erected a year ago, has been a means of great blessing, and we feel to praise our Heavenly Father for the victories won in His name. We have a debt on our building of $625, and the parties holding the note are demanding that we pay it soon, but on account of poor crops last year, we are unable to do so, and for the same reason, there is no money to borrow here at present. If some one that is interested in church extension work in this western country would be so kind as to loan us the money we need, we will give them good security, and will appreciate the kindness very much. Besides helping us you will be helping the Kingdom of God.

NEW ENGLAND YEARLY MEETING

China, Maine—China Monthly Meeting of Friends was held at South China, Maine, January 14. It was a very interesting occasion. Besides a very profitable season of worship, there was the annual roll call of its membership, to which there were responses in writing from absent members, and a word of testimony or text of scripture from those present. Following the roll call, the meeting was addressed by L. G. March, of the M. E. Church of North Vassalboro, who also assisted our pastor, Perry D. Macy, in a meeting for boys and men in the evening. All of the special efforts for the day were under the direction of the Social Service Committee for China Monthly Meeting.

NEW YORK YEARLY MEETING

Upperville—Butternuts Quarterly Meeting was held at Upperville, Chenango County, New York, January 17th and 18th. On Saturday morning the gospel message was delivered by Fred Slocum, a Baptist evangelist, who is conducting union revival services in the near-by village of Smyrna. His singer, Prof. Sands, was also present and led the song service. Ministers belonging to our Quarterly Meeting preached at the remaining services. As opportunity was given, a number took part in prayer and testimony. Upperville Meeting has increased in life and interest the past year. Last summer a successful revival was held here, conducted by Robert O. Lewis, evangelist, assisted by Olive P. Aylesworth, gospel singer, and her sister, Edna L. Aylesworth, pianist. All these workers are members of another denomination, but they came to us in the providence of God, and their labors were much blessed.

NORTH CAROLINA YEARLY MEETING

Winston-Salem—Friends here are feeling much encouraged over the prospect of the work at this place. They held their second anniversary meeting on the 8th of January at 7:30 o'clock. The "Woman's Auxiliary" served refreshments, which were enjoyed by a goodly number of Friends and others. A short program was rendered, after which the business of the meeting was transacted in love and unity and many expressions of satisfaction and pleasure resulting from the occasion were heard. One new member was received by certificate from Friendsville Monthly Meeting, Tennessee. The women Friends have done good work in soliciting the money to renovate the interior of the meeting house, which now presents an attractive appearance. The pastor, David E. Sampson, has for nearly two weeks been confined at home through illness, but we are glad to report that he has nearly regained his normal health. The pastor not being able to attend the meeting on the 18th, the services were conducted by the members, several of whom took part either in testimony or prayer, and near the close of the meeting, one of our most promising young men arose and said, "This day is a turning point in my life. I have been trying to live a Christian, but I realize I must not compromise with the world, so from this time forth I am wholly the Lord's."

OREGON YEARLY MEETING

Portland—By the consideration of the needs of some departments of the work of the church, a lively interest has been noted in the mid-week prayer meetings of Portland Monthly Meeting for a number of weeks. The leader, who was chosen from the committee representing the particular department, would in a brief and concise manner, present the needs of that department and emphasize its importance as an organic part of the work of the church, after which the whole meeting would unite in prayer for needed help and blessing in that specific line. By this means a more general knowledge and a deeper interest in the entire effort of the church on the part of the membership in general became evident.

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING

Moorestown, New Jersey—The Moorestown Friends' Reading Circle met at the home of Joel Cadbury on the 14th. The general subject of consideration was "Christian Unity and Co-operation," which was sub-divided as follows: "In the United States," Henry W. Roberts; "In Canada and England," by Edward L. Richie; "In Foreign Missions," by Katharine A. Warrington. "The Haverford Federation of Churches" was discussed by Anna Rhoads Ladd.

WILMINGTON YEARLY MEETING

Wilmington—At the C. E. meeting on January 18, Leanna Wright and Lewis Moon gave an account of the Student Volunteer Conference at Kansas City. February 1, will be observed as "Go to Church To-day" Sunday by the churches of Wilmington.

Dover—A very successful evangelistic service was held at Dover Friends' Church near Wilmington, Ohio, from January 4th to January 18th, inclusive. Ida Allen of Urbana, was the evangelist. Her messages were clear and delivered in the power of the Spirit. There was a good attendance at most of the meetings. The church as a whole, received a great spiritual uplift, many making an entire consecration and resolving to do all that the Lord requires at their hands. There will be several additions to the membership. Mrs. Allen came to us as a stranger in person, but left us loved by all.

THE PROPOSED CONFERENCE OF MEN

We are receiving numerous letters about the proposed conference of men, mostly favorable, some conditional, and some in opposition. Five Yearly Meeting Clerks have thus far endorsed the proposition, while one announces that he does not want to be considered in opposition, though not quite seeing as yet its practicality. A Yearly Meeting Pastors' Association, a monthly meeting, and a large Monthly Meeting Men's League have endorsed it.

We give below a few letters and clippings from others:

A Men's League—The proposition sent to the last Five Years Meeting, from California Yearly Meeting, suggesting the establishment of a department of men's work, had its origin in the Men's League of Whittier Monthly Meeting. This organization has a membership of more than two hundred men, and I desire to say that we endorse most heartily the idea of a conference of men of the Friends' Church representing all our Yearly Meetings. We believe there are great and growing demands for just such a conference as soon as it can be arranged for.

W. V. COFFIN,
President Men's League.

Muscatine Monthly Meeting, Iowa—The Monthly Meeting of Muscatine City Friends' Church, talked over the matter of the men's meeting at our Monthly Meeting held January 15th, and they gave their endorsement to the call for a gathering of the men of Friends' Church.

EDITH HERWIG, Clerk.
JENNIE FIELD, Rec. Clerk.

George D. Weeks, Denver, Colorado—"I have been interested in the proposition of a conference for men of our Church. I write to say that I am very much in favor of the plan. I also want to thank you for making the proposition. As a Church we certainly do need some aggressive work done, and such a conference would probably give us some definite lines of action along which we might proceed."

Josie Woodard, Salem, Oregon—"At this time, when the women of Salem, Oregon, have just routed the liquor interests, with the assistance of the men, of course, your suggestion comes with something of a shock. We do not increase rapidly, but few do get to the top of high hills. If we follow the inner Light, but at the same time let a progressive spirit into our meetings, there will be no need to shut the women out of any of them."

James C Rogers, Brooklyn, New York—"Though it would be quite impossible for me to be present, I am heartily in favor of the proposed conference of men Friends, and that without any reflection whatever on the opposite sex. Here in Brooklyn and New York we are so scattered that our problems are especially hard to solve along certain lines. * * * The men are not taking hold with enough earnestness, or perhaps, rather, many of them don't see just where to take hold—of a man's job for the Church. I wish the conference success."

H. M. Haworth, Kirk, Colorado—"I am for the convention if you will not cut the women Friends out. They are the best part of the Friends' Society."

Grover C. Hawk, Oskaloosa, Iowa—"I am heartily in sympathy with a convention for men only, and hope it may be arranged to occur shortly."

Stella H. Hockett, Stickney, South Dakota—"Your appeal for an expression from the Church membership regarding the advisability of holding a men's conference has impressed me very much. Personally, I like the plan. As women in the Church, we have had our Women's Missionary Society, which excludes men from its membership, and our privilege in doing so has not been seriously questioned. The very fact that there are no sex distinctions in the Friends' Church therefore, is sufficient reason why the men should have the same privilege if they wish. * * * There are problems confronting the Church which cannot be conscientiously discussed too much, and if men can feel greater liberty in discussing these problems alone, those of us who are excluded will await with great interest the outcome of such a gathering."

A CORRECTION

In the issue of January 15th, on page 39, in the fourteenth line from the bottom of the first column, the word "incompatible" should be "incorruptible."

YOUNG PEOPLE'S DAY

February 8th has been set apart for Young People's Day, and all meetings are asked to observe it in some way, by some special service, or at regular meetings for worship in charge of the young people. At this meeting announcements should be made of the fifth annual conference for young Friends at Winona Lake, Indiana, July 22-28, 1914. Each meeting is asked to appoint delegates and take an offering for the conference. Send the offering to the Secretary, Lillian E. Hayes, Dunreith, Indiana.

PASSING OF A QUARTERLY MEETING

On December 19-21, Westfield Quarterly Meeting was held at Salem, Union County, Indiana, for the last time. The Monthly Meetings composing the Quarter have united with Whitewater at Richmond. Both of the Monthly Meetings made a request last fall to this effect, and the Yearly Meeting concurring, they are now members of this Quarterly Meeting. It was a great trial to the members of Elk Monthly Meeting to have the Quarterly Meeting laid down, feeling that it would be detrimental to the interest of the church at this place. Elk Monthly Meeting is the second oldest meeting of Friends west of the Great Miami River.

It was set up by Miami Quarterly Meeting on December 12, 1809, and when West Branch Quarter was organized by Baltimore Yearly Meeting in 1812, Elk Monthly Meeting was transferred from Miami Quarterly Meeting to West Branch, which at that time was composed of West Branch, Elk and Whitewater. It was arranged for the Quarterly Meeting to be held, as the old Minutes read, "circularly." But under these conditions it was held but once at Elk. On March 19, 1824, Westfield Quarterly Meeting was organized or "set up" as the old Minutes expressed it, by Indiana Yearly Meeting.

The meetings were to be held alternately between Elk and Salem. William Talbert was appointed Clerk, and William Brenn assistant. Joseph Hoag, from Ferrisburg Monthly Meeting in Vermont, a noted Friends minister, and whose journal is found in many of our old libraries today, and Daniel Pucket, of New Garden, Indiana, were in attendance at the opening of this new Quarterly Meeting. For eighty-nine years the meetings have been held at Elk and Salem. Westfield Monthly Meeting withdrew in 1829, and were followers of Elias Hicks at the time of separation.

The Elk Creek Meeting at that time was the largest and most prosperous at any time in the history of the meeting. At the time of separation there were four hundred members, and fully one-third of them went out with the Separatists, as they were called. At the laying down of the Quarterly Meeting, Truman Kenworthy, of Whitewater, Aaron Napier, of Wabash, and Emerson Clyde, of Earlham, were the ministers present, together with Amassa Jenkins, Evangelistic Superintendent of Whitewater, and other visiting Friends.

A LESSON FROM HISTORY

At the second meeting of the "Quakerism Study Class" of Minneapolis, Friends discussed the Hicksite separation of 1828. The large attendance, the interest in the discussion, and the conclusions reached proved that they were, by no means, dealing with dead history, but something that bears a vital relation to the living problems of today.

The discussion was led by Dr. J. H. Stuart. A special effort was made to stick as closely as possible to the facts, and to secure a fair and open-minded view of the whole controversy. The historical facts and events leading up to the Hicksite movement were carefully gone over, then the facts of the separation itself, and finally the actual results. The main doctrinal issues, the influence of English Friends, and a few minor phases of the movement were also discussed.

Both in Dr. Stuart's address, and in the discussion that followed, was expressed the conviction that a great and most unfortunate separation had occurred in the Society, and that modern Quakerism can not afford to perpetuate or repeat the mistakes of the past. The ideals, principles, and opportunities of Quakerism are too big to give place to creeds and opinions. Of course, there must be a certain uniformity of belief, so far as the foundations of faith are concerned, in order for an organization to hold together, but the idea and tendency of modern Quakerism should be to reduce these to the minimum and give to the honest heart and mind the freedom of conscience and courage of conviction that are so necessary to permanent spiritual growth.

Differences of opinion we are bound to have, so long as we have independent minds and do any serious thinking—so long as our religion is a vital, living, practical reality—but that does not mean that we need to magnify those differences and lose sight of the bigger things that really count. As expressed in one of the aims at a Young Friends' Conference last summer, may this modern Quaker spirit become a great unifying force in the Church, that we may come to be known less and less as orthodox and Hicksite, and more and more simply as Friends; and, rallying about our great Quaker ideals, work out together our mission in the world. * * *

"PRESENT DAY PAPERS"

The first issue of this new magazine is off the press with the January number. As previously set forth, it is presented as a direct successor to The British Friend, which now yields the field of journalism. The publication is in magazine form and style, and is under the direct editorial control of Rufus M. Jones, with Editorial Boards in both America and England. The issue is of thirty-six pages with a four-page cover additional, and is of good mechanical make-up.

The editorials are characterized by the usual vigor and clearness of the managing editor. The magazine is not to be sectarian and will contain few denominational marks, but the Quaker faith will be expressed and interpreted. The periodical is not to be controversial, but replies to articles and criticisms will be printed under the head of "Discussion."

Contributed articles are by Isaac Sharpless, Joan M. Fry, R. M. Jones, George A. Barton and Edward Grubb.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE NOTES

Minute 28. The following policy from the Evangelistic Board was approved and the Board is encouraged to go forward in securing subscriptions to carry on their work.

The Evangelistic and Church Extension Board submits the following policy as being within the scope of its operations as defined in the uniform discipline of the Five Years Meeting:

1. The chief work of this Board shall be the development of Home Missions.

2. It shall seek to stimulate interest in Home Mission work within or without the limits of the Yearly Meetings, co-operating with these where help is needed.

3. It shall seek to aid in locating, directing and supporting workers and in building houses for worship.

4. Its purpose shall be in each case to make such meetings self supporting as soon as possible.

5. It realizes an urgent need of—(a) A worker to devote his whole time to its interests within the limits of the Five Years Meeting. (b) A permanent endowment fund for loan purposes. (c) The inauguration of measures and the training of workers with a view of meeting the practical problems of rural and city communities.

6. It asks for a share in the income from the envelope contributions in such proportion as the Executive Board of the Five Years Meeting shall assign to it.

BIBLE SCHOOL LESSON

February 8.

Subject—Darkness and Light.

Lesson—Luke 11: 14-26; 33-36.

Golden Text—Look therefore, whether the light that is in thee be not darkness. —Luke 11: 35.

Jesus was out on his usual mission of mercy and love, illustrating his gospel message by kindly deeds. The event probably occurred in Perea following the last lesson, though it may be recorded out of chronological order, and may have happened in Gallilee. The time and place do not affect the truths of the lesson.

I.

The Messianism of Jesus was having to meet another test. His critics, driven to desperation, make a bold charge, apparently without taking time to analyze its logic. Jesus has performed another act of mercy. A dumb man has been made to talk. *"By Beelzebub * * * casteth he out demons."* *"Others * * * sought of him a sign from heaven."* By every device known to wicked and designing men, his enemies were determined to discredit Jesus and his work.

Note the logic of Jesus, and the power of his analysis. He draws the picture of two antagonistic kingdoms; good against bad; right against wrong; God against Satan. Satan will not destroy his own agencies. "A house divided against a house falleth." By attacking and driving out the evil in the dumb man, Jesus could not himself have been the agent of evil. On the contrary, his act is proof that Jesus is stronger than Satan. He must, therefore, belong to the other kingdom. The logic is irresistible. "Then is the kingdom of God come upon you." The act itself was proof of the false charge of his critics. It was the positive proof of his Messianism.

"By whom do your sons cast them out?" Who was the power behind the Jewish exorcists? By what authority did they practice divination and endeavor to work magic upon their fellows? If they could heal the sick and cast out demons, and not be under the reign of Beelzebub, then why make this charge against Jesus?

"He that gathereth not with me scattereth." Herein is the test of Christian discipleship. No man who really loves God can do aught against his kingdom. No Christian can be for the saloon, or tolerate vice, or be negligent of Christian obligations along any line.

"Findeth it swept and garnished." Jesus was here proclaiming a mighty truth, and was teaching for all the ages. Positive good must supplant evil. The heart that is emptied of self and the demons of wickedness must needs be filled with the spirit and the elements that incite to good works. It is not enough merely to be saved. Forgiveness is the starting point of positive Christian living. No disciple can remain neutral in the face of the conflict between good and evil. Every life must be filled with a great purpose to serve God.

II.

"Whether the light that is in thee be not darkness." How many lights there are hid under a bushel! How many talents there are hid in the napkin and hence unproductive! How many lives there are which are all profession without the reality of possession! How many church members we have whose spark of Christian light illumines no pathway for others!

Jesus is the light of the world, and his light must be started in every life, both as a guide to the possessor and as a beacon to win others for God's kingdom. "Open the windows of your soul and let the light from above fall upon your life."

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR

February 8.

Topic—Twelve Great Verses. II. The Safety Verse. Ps. 27: 1. (Consecration Meeting.)

What is there to make one afraid? Wherein lies danger? Against whom or what must men and women be on their guard?

The many answers to these questions will suggest a variety of "safety" Bible texts. There are dangers physical and dangers spiritual, but God is a God of love, and will protect his own. There are dangers in temptations, dangers in business, in society, in politics, dangers in many directions so long as sin reigns, but Jehovah is "strong and mighty."

Let each member bring to the meeting and recite a "safety" text of the member's own choosing. Let the leader select a list to be read at the meeting. How many there will be to reinforce, "Jehovah is the strength of my life!"

Bruner—Philip Bruner, son of Dr. and Mrs. B. K. Bruner, of Greenfield, Indiana, died January 12th, of pneumonia, after less than a week's illness. He was a graduate of Earlham College, having taken his masters degree there, and was governor in that institution in 1911. The last two years he had been studying in Indiana Medical College and had a promising future. He was very well known and as an athlete was one of the star football and base ball players, being assistant coach in 1911 and 1912. His mother, Mrs. Dr. Bruner, is one of the trustees of Earlham College.

Connor—Lucinda Bales Connor was born in Morganville, Ohio, December 12, 1827, where she spent her girlhood days and received her education, and in 1844 was married. In 1879, she moved to Heser, Kansas. She lived a consistent Christian life and was a faithful attender of meetings. About two and a half years ago, she became too feeble to live alone, and moved to Leavenworth to the William Small Memorial Home for old ladies. On January 2d, she suffered a stroke of paralysis, which rendered her unconscious. She died on the evening of the 6th, at the age of 86 years and 24 days.

She was pre-eminently a home woman, a helpful, sympathizing wife, a companionable mother, a most noble woman.

Levering—Samuel Levering, son of Thomas and Rachel Ann Schofield Levering, was born in Washington, D. C., in 1828. In 1852, he was united in marriage with Phebe R. Hathaway, and settled on a farm in Morrow County, Ohio. Here were born to them seven daughters and three sons, and here they continued to live until 1882, when they removed to Blount County, Tennessee. His was a life of quiet consistent attention to the duties of a Christian husband and father, not forgetting his duties to mankind at large. He was greatly interested in peace and temperance. His wife and eight children are still living to revere his memory. He departed this life at the home of his son, Thomas H. Levering, Washington, D. C., on December 28, 1913, aged 85 years 3 months and 6 days.

Swift—Nathan G. Swift died at his home near Millbrook, New York, December 30, 1913, in the ninety-seventh year of his age. He was a life-long member of Nine Partners

FRIENDLY TIP

Restored Hope and Confidence

After several years of indigestion and its attendant evil influence on the mind, it is not very surprising that one finally loses faith in things generally.

A N. Y. woman writes an interesting letter. She says:

"Three years ago I suffered from an attack of peritonitis which left me in a most miserable condition. For over two years I suffered from nervousness, weak heart, shortness of breath, could not sleep, etc.

"My appetite was ravenous, but I felt starved all the time. I had plenty of food but it did not nourish me because of intestinal indigestion. Medical treatment did not seem to help. I got discouraged, stopped medicine, and did not care much whether I lived or died.

"One day a friend asked me why I didn't try Grape-Nuts food, stop drinking coffee and use Postum. I had lost faith in everything, but to please my friend I began to use both and soon became very fond of them.

"It wasn't long before I got some strength, felt a decided change in my system, hope sprang up in my heart and slowly but surely I got better. I could sleep very well, the constant craving for food ceased and I have better health now than before the attack of peritonitis.

"My husband and I are still using Grape-Nuts and Postum."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

WE GUARANTEE that in zero weather the Furnace shall have the power and capacity of maintaining in all the rooms connected with it, an average temperature of not less than 60 degrees Fahrenheit in the bed rooms and of not less than 72 degrees Fahrenheit in the living rooms without forcing, and subject to the following limits:

- I. Without making the fire-box red hot.
- II. With slow, steady fire.
- III. With no heat escaping to the chimney except enough to keep the draft good.
- IV. With slow formation of gas, and its thorough mixture with thin air-blasts for combustion.
- V. One fire-box full of good hard or soft coal will last 15 hours in zero weather and 24 hours in ordinary winter weather. It may be left in shape to temper the house several days without personal attention.

VI. By its Automatic Control, the furnace will regulate its own fire, and maintain the heat needed, according to the way you keep the Governor set. It will open its draft door wide to get a fresh fire well ignited, then reduce it gradually and hold it to admit only the draft needed.

VII. It will close its own Direct Draft when the fire is sufficiently kindled. As an automatic protection against overheats, it will open the Check Door and close the Ash Door.

VIII. The Cleanliness and Protection from Poison is in the one-piece fire-box itself, being entirely of "Mild Steel," more than three-sixteenths inch thick, annealed, welded at the seams, and absolutely imperforate.

IX. The Ventilation shall be fully up to the standard, determined and approved by the recognized authorities, fresh out-door air being warmed and admitted, 2,000 to 3,000 cubic feet per hour per person (reckoning twice as many persons as bed rooms). An active inter-room circulation shall also be maintained, bringing you, even when crowded into a living room, the full supply of air, none of which has been indoors but a few minutes. Its freshness will not be destroyed by overheating. The percentage of breathed air will be so small as to analyze safely within the prescribed limit of six parts breath—CO<sub>2</sub> in 10,000 parts of the air. DO NOT EXAGGERATE

A California Friend has asked us to publish the following from the Pasadena Star of December 31, 1913:

"California should not be over-boasted along any line. Representations should not be made in misleading manner, in states far distant, that this is an earthly Paradise where a living may be plucked by the indigent man without any effort whatever. Nor should it be made to appear that there is abundance of work here, at remunerative wages, for all workingmen who may come. There is reason to believe that misrepresentation in this regard has induced tens of thousands of laboring men to come here from the East, expecting to find employment, only to find that there is no work for them. The true situation should be made clear."

In His Own Likeness

E. Leigh Mudge

Why should we love the sinful soul of man,
A faulty thing, neglectful of its mission,
Marred with its countless errors, self-condemned?
Should not man love the Highest? Can the soul
Loving aught else escape the penalty
Of self-accommodation to its love?

Ah, we should love the good that is in man,
Serve his best impulse, live to bring to light
The inner tracings of that primal form
Whereto the God-breathed spirit was ordained.
For good is not all supernatural,
But every good reveals divinity;
And God has set his likeness in our lives—
Image of God, impressed on common clay—
That meanest earth may be all glorified
By contact with his presence—given to dust
The wonderful, transforming breath of life.
Then when man lost the image, for his love
The Lord came down to teach us to be men—
Not to be gods, but godlike; men, not kings—
And bade return the attribute divine,
Attribute likest God, to be a man.
Thus is God's image set before the world,
Not in a carven niche or minster pile,
But in the lives of men; and as we see
The rich unfolding of the soul of man,
Let us be worshipful before the King
Whose presence in the temple glorifies.

But other visions to my dreaming come—
Dim phantom wraiths of long-lost purity,
Clad in the tawdry rags of vice and sin;
And these, too, must we love?

Ah, questioner

What man retains in pristine innocence
The primal image? All have sinned, and lost
Some portion of the spotless heritage.
But we may cleanse the fountain of our heart,
And gain a vision like the heavenly,
Which, seeing evil, treasures all the good,
And strives to wake man's better self from sin.
While in the darkness glows a spark of life,
That spark is rich in hidden potencies.
Revere in these, the handiwork of God,
And let thy love lift up the heart forlorn;
Then this, thy tribute: "In thy loving deed Unto the least, ye did it unto me."

Next Week

In next week's issue we will republish an editorial from the current number of the Western Christian Advocate on "George Fox, a Spiritual Pioneer." There will be the first installment of a valuable article on "Doing Our Best with the Bible School," by Walter W. Haviland. The fifth number of "A Monthly Meeting Chronicle" will also appear, together with the conclusion of the report by Robert L. Kelly on Secondary Education.

An "American Friend Day"

We have received a suggestion from Walter H. Wilson of Springbrook, Oregon, which appeals to us as being most practical. It is to the effect that a day be set apart to be known as "AMERICAN FRIEND Day," when the interests of the paper will be presented and new subscriptions taken for it. THE AMERICAN FRIEND is now a department of the Five Years Meeting and has claims upon the whole Church, which may with propriety be urged at the time of the Sabbath service.

We are, therefore, suggesting that on Sabbath, March 1st, the claims of the paper be presented to the congregations in some substantial manner. In many instances, no doubt, the burden of the matter will be felt more or less in the sermons preached and in the prayers offered. In any case, at the close of the service, we ask that some one be designated to present the matter in a specific way, and we see no impropriety in allowing subscriptions to be taken at once, just as collections for other departments of the Church are frequently taken.

As an extra inducement, we make the unusual offer of allowing new subscriptions to be taken at that time and immediately after at $1.00 for the remainder of this year. After this special day, some one can with propriety be assigned to canvass the community for additional subscriptions. This will have to be a labor of love for the benefit of the Church, as at this special price we can offer no commission.

Will not friends of the paper, ministers and others, take up this matter and arrange for the observance of March 1st as "AMERICAN FRIEND Day"? If that day does not suit all meetings, either February 22d or March 8th can be observed by such as these.

The letter of Walter H. Wilson, referred to above, is in part as follows:

"I am wondering if it would be advisable to decide upon some Sabbath as 'American Friend Day,' and ask that pastors throughout Quakerdom present the matter of our official Church paper, and the importance of the Church supporting it properly. It might be possible to give a brief review of our history as relates to our periodicals; this at the Sabbath morning service (or evening), and then have it arranged for some competent person to make a canvass of the membership in the interests of the paper. * * * It would have the advantage of being simultaneous, which ought to give added interest to the undertaking. This plan, it seems to me, ought to result in a thousand or fifteen hundred new subscribers to The American Friend at once. Your editorials are worth more than the price of the paper."

The World in Action

State Religion in China. Despite strenuous protests, the President of China continues to give serious and favorable consideration to the question of making Confucianism the state religion of China. His council of seventy political advisers appears to be backing him.

The Largest Presbyterian Church. The First Church in Seattle, Washington, is reported to have 5,500 members and is said to be the largest Presbyterian Church in the world. The pastor has four assistants. Twelve hundred and eighty-nine persons contribute to the Church support, and the pastor asks for at least twelve hundred new members this year.

MY QUAKER FATHERS

Like music from some dim receding shore
That falls on pensive solitude and tears,
Or like some fleeting fragrance that revives
Sweet memories and thought of other years,
Comes from my Quaker Fathers, long removed,
A tender joy and influence benign,
And with a reverence and love sincere,
I contemplate this dear ancestral line.

O gentle folk! how oft your voices mild
Assailed the wrong; what perfect innocence
Didst crown your lives; how free from guile you were,
(And oh! how far from present day pretense!)
Because of you, I walk with surer step;
Your ways of life so singular and sweet,
Your purity and peace, your fervent faith,
Are guiding lamps unto my wayward feet.

Dear Quaker Fathers of the olden day,
Your simple lives have wrought a spell o'er mine,
Your presence as from tuneful wind-swept lyre,
Has filled my soul with harmony divine.
A company ancestral claim my pride,
And of my deep affection have their part,
But oh! my Quaker Fathers calm, serene,
Are strangely near and fashioned to my heart.

The Church Must Be Evangelistic

The acme of Christian activity is evangelism. The primal and vital purpose of every gospel effort is to win humanity for the Kingdom of Jehovah. The utter inadequacy of the non-Christian religions to meet man's deepest needs has been established by the severest tests. Jehovah worship alone has stood the storms of the ages. The problem of humanity is the problem of getting humanity back to God.

Social service and home missions and all the rest are only contributory to the mighty plan of world redemption. The gospel of economic or political or social reform is merely the visible interpretation of one phase of the doctrine of human brotherhood that seeks deliverance from wrong. Were there no sin, there would be no need of the Church—as a Church. Sin has wrecked humanity, blighted its hopes, distorted its purposes, destroyed its faith, and humanity needs a Savior. It is the great world cry of all the ages, humanity groping in the dark, hopelessly lost without a Savior. Upon no other hypothesis is the great work of the Church justified. There can be no other claim for its existence, except that it help the world to find God through Jesus Christ by the revelations of the Holy Spirit.

But sin will never lose its grip upon humanity without a struggle. It is the kingdom of darkness pitted against righteousness. It is the age-long conflict, about which the prophets were burdened, for which Jesus died and in consequence of which the martyrs suffered. The Church is God's representative to win the world back to Him.

Christ set an example in procedure when He established the order of discipleship; when with them He went throughout the towns and villages and along the country highways seeking to win men for the new kingdom; when He sent out seventy others to go before His face and prepare the way for His coming. Jesus did not wait for a congregation to come to Him; He went out upon a hunt for needy souls, and having found them, His converts became evangelists to spread the news of Christ in still other communities that had not yet received the message.

That is evangelism in practical operation. The Church that is content to minister to its own membership alone is doomed. The Church is something more than a religious aristocracy, something more than a social club, something more than a close corporation of believers. Along every highway of life the Church should be scattered, hunting out needy men and women and pointing them to Jesus Christ. Not alone by a formal message, not alone by the example of a godly life, but by the practical, busy, persistent hunt for human souls that need a Savior, must the Church fill up its mission in the world. The sacrificial element must enter into all religious work. To be rightly evangelical, the Church must be truly missionary, and to be missionary it must have the spirit of sacrifice. No man can afford to wrap the robes of righteousness about him and minister to self; much less can the Christian Church.

Perhaps the modern Church has lost something of that spirit of suffering for righteousness' sake that impelled Knox and Whitfield and Francis Xavier and Fox and Wesley to anxiety of soul for the sake of the multitudes who knew not God. The world can never be saved by platitudes. Unitarianism has no message for the soul that is conscious of its sin. We hold no commission to defend any particular method of evangelism, but we are intensely anxious to condemn no method that is breaking through the veneer of sinful custom and habit in order to bring the message of the Son of God to the consciousness of needy men and women. Perhaps the Church is controlled too much by conventionality.

An evangelist said recently that "the Church has lost its present tense." In a measure it describes our own denomination. Friends are prone to live in the past, while some are filled with the vision of the future. How few there are who seem to have the burden of making the Society of Friends an agency of mighty salvation here and now! It is to this generation we must speak with effectiveness if we are to be preserved with life enough to minister to the next one as we ought. The spirit of evangelism, possessing first the individual, needs to sweep our beloved Church from one end of the country to the other, until, endowed with the spirit of Fox, we enter upon a campaign of soul winning that will shake every community where Quakersm can take a foot hold. Every department of the Church waits upon such a stirring of our membership. Every problem, financial, educational, missionary, social, young people's, Bible School, Church extension, will find its solution in the spirit of revival which ought to envelop our entire membership.

The Spirit of the mighty God is abroad in the earth. It is high tide in the Christian world. God is pulling at the heart strings of humanity in every land, and He wants a Church that is sensitive to the demands of the age. It is an era of soul winning everywhere. A mighty wave of religious interest is encircling the earth. In the foreign field as well as in all Christendom, the hearts of men and women in a new way are susceptible to the truth of God. The evidences are multitudinous. God grant that in our own ranks the claims of custom and tradition may not be able to resist the tug of the progressive spirit, that would send the Church out on new errands of mercy and with a rejuvenated message for the redemption of mankind.

We invite all our readers to give special attention to the suggestion of an "AMERICAN FRIEND Day," found on page 2 of this issue. There are few meetings where one or two new subscriptions cannot be secured in this way, and there are many in which it is our belief that from ten to twenty can be added to our list. This periodical can be made invaluable to the Society of Friends in this country, if only it is given the proper patronage. Will not Friends in every meeting enter into the spirit of the suggestion and make March 1st a day that will count tremendously for our Church periodical? It ought to mean 3,000 new subscribers at the special price of $1.00 until January 1, 1915, and it ought to mean new interest in the publication. Remember, March 1st is the day!

"Consider Christ Jesus" Heb. 3:1

BY LUKE WOODARD

No. VII

The Ascension

"And He led them out as far as to Bethany, and He lifted up His hands and blessed them, and it came to pass while He blessed them He was parted from them and carried up into heaven."—Luke 24: 50-51.

In the foregoing brief sentence, and a similar one in Acts 1: 9, and a briefer one by Mark 16: 19, our Lord's Ascension is recorded. As is usual with the evangelists, this most remarkable event is mentioned without comment or embellishment. They evidently considered it to be their business to chronicle facts.

It was very fitting that this leave-taking should take place at Bethany on the Mount of Olives, where Jesus and His disciples had often found rest, refreshment and hallowed association in the home of the loved trio, Lazarus and his sisters, Mary and Martha, and where He raised the former from the dead.

And how different this farewell, ending in blessing, from that expressed near the same spot a short time before when He uttered His farewell lament over the beloved, but now rejected city: "And when He was come near, He beheld the city, and wept over it, saying, 'If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things that belong to thy peace! But now they are hid from thine eyes.'" "Behold your house is left unto you desolate, for I say unto you ye shall not see me henceforth till ye shall say, blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord."—Luke 19: 42; Matthew 23: 28-29.

The Ascension was for various reasons an appropriate close of our Lord's earthly life. We can readily understand what would have been the bewilderment of His disciples had he disappeared secretly, even though it had been by a bodily ascension. On the other hand, what confirmation of their faith in Him; what certainty it gave to His promise to intercede for them and to send the Comforter, and of His oft-repeated assurance that He would come again, when they saw Him ascend and heard the testimony of the two angels, who said: "This same Jesus which is taken up from you into Heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into Heaven."—Acts 1: 10-11.

While the deity of Christ could not be predicated on the fact of His bodily ascension, since Enoch and Elijah were translated that they should not see death, and of the latter it is said, "He was a man of like passions as we are," nevertheless His visible bodily departure from the world was in keeping with His miraculous advent, with His resurrection, and the fully attested fact that He was the Son of God.

Christ's mediatorial work, begun on earth, is still carried on in heaven. During His life on earth He was Teacher, Prophet and Exemplar. He was also priest and sacrifice, "offering Himself without spot to God." "Now once in the end of the world hath He appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself." We have a great High Priest who is passed into the heavens, "who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens," where, as Intercessor, He pleads for the saints the efficacy of His own blood. "Wherefore He is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them."

The terms Intercessor, Mediator and Advocate seem to be used by New Testament writers interchangeably and designate alike official titles of the Lord Jesus Christ. In I John 1: 1-2, we find this: "My little children, these things write I unto you that ye sin not; and if any man sin we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous; and He is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world." Advocate is a legal term. It refers to one who appears in behalf of one, who, because he has transgressed the law, is legally disqualified to plead in his own behalf. While we admit that heavenly things cannot be matched by things earthly, yet we may illustrate and enforce spiritual truth by comparisons. An advocate in our courts to be eligible must possess certain qualifications. He must, from a legal standpoint, be righteous, that is, the law must have no unadjusted claims against him. We do not admit a participant in the crime to appear as the advocate of the accused.

This qualification is possessed in the highest degree by our Advocate with the Father. He is termed "Jesus Christ, the Righteous." The definite article "the" makes it emphatic. Others may obtain the quality of righteousness, but only by faith in Him, and through sanctification of the Spirit; but with Jesus Christ it was not an acquired quality, but a native possession. "He was holy, harmless, undefiled and separate from sinners." Even at His birth, the angel said to Mary: "That Holy thing that shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God." He is the only one that had a right to challenge scrutiny as He did. "Which of you convinceth me of sin?" He called on others to repent, but never Himself felt the need of it.

Another requisite for an advocate, is knowledge—knowledge of the law, and of his client's relation to it; in what respect is he guilty? Jesus Christ, being the promulgator of the law, has perfect knowledge of it, and knowing "what is in man" He is qualified to judge of both the outward act, and of the condition of the heart that prompted it.

An advocate should not only know the law, but he must be one that will not in any way impair its integrity or weaken its force. Attorneys in our courts too often employ methods to pervert justice and screen the guilty. But not so with our Advocate with the Father. He will not, to speak figuratively, enter court with a sinner that does not plead guilty. He appears in behalf of such not to save them from conviction, but from execution; that is, by a method of grace which, while not palliating the sinner's guilt, takes away the sin that was its cause, and thus, while producing a feeling of condemnation, saves him from final condemnation in the Judgment of the Great Day.

An advocate must respect the honor of the judge, and it is well if he can approach him as an equal, at the same time that he is the true friend of the one whose cause he undertakes. Our heavenly Advocate is our "Daysman that can lay His hand upon us both" (Job 9: 33). In point of dignity and power He is one with the Father, and can approach him, as in His intercessory prayer, John 17, with the language, "Father, I will," etc. On the other hand, He is touched with the feeling of our infirmities. What was meant as a reproach by His enemies—"A friend of publicans and sinners"—was really a deserved eulogy. If proof were asked, we have only to note His dealing while here on earth with this class, and especially that supreme display of His love—the scene at Calvary, when He "died for the ungodly," and while enduring the agony of the cross prayed for His murderers, "Father, forgive them, they know not what they do."

By Christ's ascension, He exchanged the footstool for the Throne: but it is a throne of grace. Well may we then, in view of all that has been revealed, embrace the divine invitation, "Let us come boldly to a throne of grace that we may obtain mercy and find grace to help in time of need."

A throne suggests the thought of power and authority, and is not approached by common people except on certain conditions and by the observance of prescribed formalities. Witness the awe and feeling of uncertainty with which Queen Esther ventured before the king Ahasuerus. She was not sure it would not cost her her life. Hers was the boldness of daring; but the boldness with which we are invited to come to a throne of Grace, is that of undoubting confidence based upon the assurance that "we have, not an High Priest which can not be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, but who was tempted in all points like as we are, yet without sin." There is no risk in approaching Him, for He is full of grace and truth. To every sin-burdened heart He extends the gracious invitation, "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest."

Earthly advocates have their office hours at which times only may one expect to see them. Not so with our heavenly Advocate; there is no time when one will fail to receive His attention if called upon in sincerity. Nor is He so occupied with others that He can not attend to all who rightly apply.

Advocates in our courts require a fee. All that our divine Advocate does is without money and without price. The poor in purse, if poor in spirit, will ever be welcome to come before Him.

Earthly advocates sometimes fail to secure a deserved verdict. Our Advocate in the court above never fails to secure for all who trust in Him, complete deliverance from the penalty of the law; and this He does as earthly advocates can not do for their clients, by effecting an inward change which, in Bible phrase, is termed a "new creation," a nature averse to sin and in love with righteousness. He sheds abroad in such a heart His love, which prompts to obedience. As He Himself said, "If ye love me ye will keep my commandments."

We may gain some idea of Christ's intercession in heaven by considering His intercessory prayer as found in John 17. It is unlike the recorded prayer of any other, I do not hesitate to say it, such as no man would ever have invented. It is the language of a Being conscious of His own dignity and authority, of His oneness with the Father and of His original and uncreated glory. How inclusive of the believers in every age: "Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also that shall believe on me through their word." Nor is His intercession ceased: "He maketh intercession for the saints according to the will of God." How blessed the assurance, "Him the Father heareth always."

Where the true believer enjoys the comforting presence of the Holy Spirit, the true communion, it should ever be in grateful remembrance of Him in whose name the Holy Spirit comes, who said: "I will pray the Father and he shall send you another Comforter, even the Spirit of truth, that he may abide with you forever." The Christian who daily enjoys this communion and calls to remembrance his risen and ascended Lord, in virtue of whose sacrifice and intercession this privilege is vouchsafed, is a partaker of the true Lord's Supper.

As to the question whether Christ now has the same body He had here on earth, it is not safe for us to enter into speculation beyond what is revealed. The Scriptures, however, warrant the belief that in ascending into His glory there was a change not into another body, but into a condition that placed Him above the limitations and requirements to which He subjected Himself while on earth, such as rest, sleep and food.

It was after His ascension that He said to John, in the Isle of Patmos, "I am the root and the offspring of David," which implied that He still retained His humanity. When He was transfigured on the Mount, "His face did shine as the sun and His garment was white as the light." He did not divest Himself of His body. So now we may believe that His being glorified is an investment of His humanity with "that glory which He had with the Father before the world was."

Report of the Committee on Secondary Education

BY ROBERT LINCOLN KELLY

To the National Council of Church Boards of Education:

The report of the Commissioner of Education for 1912 furnishes some valuable and suggestive information concerning secondary schools under private or denominational control. There are in the country 2,044 private high schools and academies distributed among the several divisions of the country:

Of these schools 110 are controlled by the Baptists, 37 by the Congregationalists, 95 by the Episcopal Church, 44 by the Friends, 50 by the Lutherans, 72 by the Methodist-Episcopal Church, 36 by the Methodist-Episcopal South, 68 by the Presbyterians, and 94 by other Protestant denominations.

Last year there were expended for sites, buildings and improvements in 502 schools $4,488,827, the total benefactions upon 87 schools being $1,262,215.

Twenty-three per cent of the children of this generation are receiving some high school education, and not only is the number increasing but the boys and girls are remaining longer both in public and private high schools. Something over ten per cent of these students are in other than public high schools. It is here that the Church finds its immediate obligation so far as secondary education is concerned.

In twenty years the number of private schools has increased from 1,632 to 2,044; in the same time the number of students in private schools has increased from 94,931 to 141,467. It is also worthy of note that within the past four years the per cent of the number of private schools has increased from 12.25 to 15.41, the per cent of the number of teachers in private schools from 18.84 to 19.28, and the per cent of the number of students from 10.02 to 11.35. This means that the private school in America is on the up-grade; it means that the private school has even unexpected vitality.

There are certain pedagogical advantages which the private school has, as is disclosed by the Commissioner's statistics: The average size of the private school is smaller than of the public school, while the teaching force is greater. The average number of public school teachers to a secondary school is 4.6; in the case of the private school the number is 6.1. The average number of students to a secondary public school is 98.5 as against 69.2 for the private school. The average number of public secondary students to a teacher is 21.3; of private secondary students to a teacher, 12.3. The average number of graduates to a secondary public school is 12.3, to a secondary private school 8.7. The per cent of the total number of students who pass on to the Senior year in the public high school is 12.98, for the private secondary school the per cent is 17.41. It appears, therefore, that the conditions are favorable for more intensive and individualistic work in the private schools.

No reference is made here to the social, cultural, moral and religious advantages of the well conducted private school. The number of public high schools for boys in the United States is 25, for girls 26, as against 423 and 749 respectively for the private schools. In the public co-educational high schools there are more girls than boys, 582,718 to 453,490. In the private co-educational schools of secondary grade there are more boys than girls, 32,067 to 31,699. There are then thousands of boys and girls whose parents are demanding a type of education different, to say the least, from that offered by the public school. It is not to the discredit of the public school to say that thousands may require a different type of education, and it should not be forgotten that the number is increasing.

And yet the general tendency of the churches is to abandon this field. There is not much of a favorable nature that the Committee can report for the past year, so far as the activities of secondary schools under control of Protestant churches is concerned. The Disciples do not maintain secondary schools as such and the United Presbyterians and the General Synod of the Evangelical Lutherans have none except in connection with their colleges. The Congregationalists report that their secondary schools are pressing for enlarged gifts. The Board of Education of the Northern Baptist Convention reports effort to greatly increase the funds of their schools in Maine. This Board, however, does not favor the founding of new secondary schools in the north and is willing to leave the matter of secondary education to the state. Some of the schools managed by the Friends have taken on new life, but others of them are maintained largely by sentiment and not because they are meeting efficiently a distinct need.

The College Board of the Presbyterian Church reports the merging of two Kentucky schools. This Board has adopted the following principles by which they are to be governed:

1. Non-approval of the establishment of new academies in the northern section of the United States.
2. When secondary schools are established in the South it will be with the expectation that they will be of temporary character.
3. A general policy to withdraw from academic work except where academies are connected with higher institutions.
4. Hearty approval of academic departments of colleges.

From other sources there comes information that there is need in some of the Southern states of schools for college preparatory purposes, since the high schools are not and presumably are not likely to be doing this type of work successfully.

The most hopeful report comes from the Board of Education of the Methodist Episcopal Church, which is planning a definite Forward Educational Movement to include practically all their secondary schools, of which they have over forty.

Friends today have two types of secondary schools; the pioneer type, founded in advance of the public school system, which struggles and eventually dies as public funds are appropriated in adequate amounts for this grade of education, and the endowed institution with high-grade equipment and expert personnel in the teaching force, which has a permanent and increasingly useful place in the educational system. The pioneer work is practically done in this country except in certain restricted districts, and yet in numerous places Friends are holding grimly on to a situation which is embarrassing and which discredits the Church.

These conditions will continue unless the management of such schools are able to rise to a higher standard, both of theory and of practice. There is room in the State of Indiana, for instance, for a high-grade academy with adequate dormitory facilities which, if properly conducted, would have increasing influence. Such a school should have an endowment of $100,000 and should be able to pay larger salaries than are paid in the colleges. In other words, it should be equipped in the very best way so that it would have real standing in the educational world, and would be able to meet a very real need of our times. There is scientific evidence to show that the churches have an open field in secondary education, but the field can be occupied only by those who have vision and are willing to expend large sums of money in putting their ideas into active operation. Unless we can do this work well—even better than it is done elsewhere—let us not do it at all. With the limited means at our disposal as a Church, the only hope of our educational salvation is through concentration, and, of course, this means death to the unfit.

A Monthly Meeting Chronicle

BY JUNIUS JUNIOR

IV.

Promptly at 10 o'clock, on April 12th, Slow Valley Monthly Meeting settled down for a season of worship. It had been hoped that the attendance would reveal an increasing interest, but only fifty-one members appeared of whom five were children. The farmers were busy, and Saturday appeared to have other attractions for city folks. The presence of two or three additional young people was encouraging.

Following a prayer by one of the women, the pastor preached from Exodus 14: 15, and it was evident that he at least had begun to catch a vision of a larger life for the congregation. A few testimonies followed, including a few remarks from our friend, the business man, and two of the young people. With apparent earnestness the company sang "Onward Christian Soldiers," and the Clerk read the opening minute.

The routine business was disposed of quickly. The overseers reported on the resignation offered at the previous meeting and recommended that it be accepted. They reported further that in their judgment the membership list should be revised, as several families had no apparent interest in the work of the meeting and some others no longer lived within their limits. It was decided to take no action for the present. The committee on meeting-house repairs reported that the leak in the roof had been attended to, but recommended that further repairs be postponed until the autumn, when it was hoped that financial conditions would be improved.

The Clerk then called for the report of the special committee appointed to consider the state of the meeting, and at once there was a spirit of animation that had been long foreign to the business sessions of the Monthly Meeting at Newtown. The retired farmer looked bored and the old physician's face had an expression of determination that meant in words that nothing radical was going to be done if he could help it. Two or three women looked like they would rather be at home, but on other faces appeared a new light of hopefulness as they turned to look upon the merchant who now rose to read the committee's report.

He said he would take no time in preliminary remarks, but wanted to express what he felt was the mind of the committee, that a most difficult task had been laid upon them, and that it was far easier to relate the facts and report conditions than it was to find an adequate remedy. He said that the committee had been endeavoring to get at the exact status of the meeting and thus far had confined itself to the work of ascertaining facts, but admitted that as yet the investigation was incomplete.

The report was conservative in tone, but interesting from the start. Some of the facts stated were almost startling and in a few points little short of sensational. There was no purpose to criticise anybody, for responsibility lay alike upon every member. Credit for faithfulness was given to those who had been foremost in keeping the meeting alive. The facts summarized were substantially as follows: The congregation was not quite holding its own; since January there had been a net loss in membership of twelve, reducing the number to 160 as compared with 189 in 1908 and 194 in 1900 which was the highest record in the history of the meeting; within the last twenty-three years there was a total record of 304 conversions with 192 accessions to the Church, yet they had not held what they had received; the average spiritual life of the meeting was apparently at a low ebb, the majority feeling little if any responsibility for maintaining the standard of the Church in the community; of the 160 members, eighteen were non-residents, a rather low per cent, and of the 142 resident members, eighteen were under ten years of age; of the 124 others, not over sixty were in the habit of attending the Sabbath morning services; it was estimated that from a dozen to twenty non-members came more or less regularly, but no apparent efforts had been made to secure their requests for membership; a meeting that could not interest its own members was hardly in position to win the allegiance of others.

Relative to finances, the report cited the deficiencies revealed in the annual reports in January, and disclosed the fact that the deficit in Monthly Meeting stock had been wiped out, and half of the deficiency in Yearly Meeting stock had been paid; the deficit in the pastor's salary had grown to $32.45, and so far as could be ascertained the collections for foreign missions were hardly up to last year's standard; too few families were bearing their share of financial responsibility, and the congregation was being weighted down by an antiquated financial plan, which no longer met their needs.

The report said that time had not sufficed to investigate the needs of the young people, and the question of the relation of the meeting to the community was untouched. No remedy was suggested except that there was need of a spiritual revival in their midst, and that a time of prayerful self examination would result in increased interest being taken in the welfare, not only of every member in the meeting, but of the neighborhood as well. The resident minister was the first to speak of the report, and in a ten minute talk startled the meeting by admitting that the report was a revelation to him, and indicated that his solicitude for the welfare of the congregation had been aroused as it had not been before. He felt that the situation was critical and needed prayerful attention. One man, however, said that times were changing, and that it could not be expected that church work could be kept at high tide all the time.

A number came to the defense of the report, and said that self-examination could only result in better conditions, unless the meeting was hopelessly dead. The retired farmer was of the opinion that unless somebody could suggest a practical remedy, it was worse than useless to be taking up the time of the meeting with a recital of conditions that everybody deplored. The young teacher said that to his mind, this investigation was the beginning of a new era for Slow Valley Meeting. They needed to go forward, but in doing it they would make better and more substantial headway if they counted the cost carefully and prayerfully.

Thus the discussion proceeded, waxing warm when intimations were made among some of the women that the report was not only a reflection upon the pastor but upon leading members of the meeting. The pastor was disposed to let the members face the problems which were arising, but ventured to express the hope that an adequate remedy could be found.

Our farmer friend, with his usual practical insight, showed that a disease could not be treated without a diagnosis, and unconsciously rebuked the opposition by saying that some of the members were beginning to get a vision of better things for the meeting, and those who dared to block the wheels of progress were assuming a terrible responsibility. He proposed that the committee be continued for another month, and that it be encouraged to act vigorously, and get at the facts regardless of whom they helped or hurt. The proposition prevailed by a majority vote, the concluding minute was read and the members dispersed, feeling the weight of a responsibility which had not been felt in that congregation for many years. For a month in every home, upon the street and in places of business, questions of what they were to do with the new situation which was rapidly arising was uppermost in all the meditations and in all the conversations. Having put their hand to the plow there could be no turning back. At least their membership must be restored, and many were beginning to think of their neighbors with new interest.

Suffer the Little Children to Come

BY E. MAE CARVELL

The great need of our Society today is for more young members, well equipped to take the places of older members who are dropping out. After much study upon this subject the writer is impressed with the fact that much depends upon the proper education of the child along the lines of Church work. We all know that those who are most efficient workers in the organized meeting are those who have from earliest years listened to the order of business and have been present when Friends met to deal with important questions.

The artist and the musician who began their work when very young children are far superior to others who have not had this advantage, and it must be so in the work of God. I make a plea for the children of our meetings. How can they become familiar with the work of the Church unless they are permitted to attend the meetings for business?

For Friends living in the country there are two, and perhaps in some instances three Monthly Meetings held during the summer vacation. All other Monthly Meetings usually come when secular schools are in session, and just here a grave question arises. When Monthly Meetings are held on week days when the children are at school, may we not profitably absent our children from school that they may become versed in the work of the Church and grow up with vital interest in the same?

Much knowledge may be obtained by a very small child, if we only knew. Little ones during the period of four to eleven years of age, if they are habitually found in the meetings will be grounded in the first principles of Friends. After eleven years of age the higher schools claim their attention, and when in the early twenties the young person is ready to begin a life work, the Church looks to them to help carry some of its burdens. Let us during these formative years do all that we can to fit them to turn all the efforts of their young lives to supporting the meetings for business as skillfully and as heartily as the meetings for worship.

"The Sunday School and the Morning Service from the Pastor's Standpoint"

BY FRANKLIN S. BLAIR

The above heading appeared in THE AMERICAN FRIEND on Christmas day and the article which followed is good. The following is from the standpoint of a Bible School pupil, teacher, superintendent, a father, overseer, elder, interdenominational Sunday School, State field worker and common observer.

George W. Bird gives what seems to be the consensus of expert opinion as to the great value of the Sunday School in bringing souls to Christ and into the Church. He makes the frequent statement that only thirty children out of fifty attend Sunday School, and of these the Church gets only ten out of thirty, that is one out of three. Suppose these thirty children are all yours, brother Bird, or are the children of any other brother, or suppose there are but three children in brother Bird's family or in the family of anybody else, and two of them are lost to the Church, lost to all eternity, and only one child in the family is saved, how shocking the thought! Still, it is the lamentable truth according to the statement given. Brother Bird says from twenty-five to thirty per cent of the pupils in the Bible School, upon an average, do not attend the preaching service.

Those of you who have read brother Bird's article, would do well to read it again, like I have done, then go through it a third time more carefully and thoughtfully, with prayer. Those of you who have not done so, would do well to read it before you go further with this article.

It seems astounding that "six Churches among Friends in Indiana in large and small places" averaged only half as many persons in attendance at the preaching service as were in the Bible School service. Such statements about Indiana Friends sound shockingly serious to us in North Carolina, for we have been taught to look on them as much ahead of us. We had not supposed that we make so poor a showing, but now we fear ours is worse. In neither state, however, should the aim be to surpass the other, nor should we be at all satisfied to go beyond the other, unless we have done as well as angels, "ministering spirits sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation." According to the statement, it seems there is poor preaching in those Indiana Yearly Meetings and poorer teaching in the Bible School services. Brother Bird blames the parents, the Sunday School and the minister in the order given. I could give many reasons why the order of blame should be reversed, as a general rule.

There is a reason back of all this deplorable state of affairs which indicates the loss of two children in every family that attends the Bible School, to say nothing of the far greater number of families who never go to Sunday School.

Why are the parents, teachers and ministers so to blame for the poor results of our Sunday School work? Simply because they do not believe in the Bible as fully as they say they do. They do not believe in the Bible as they do in the ordinary school books and the day school. Otherwise results would be far different.

The Only True Sympathy

MAE WINDHAM

"Marie, here is a telegram from John. His wife has met with an accident—perhaps fatal—and she wants you."

"She wants me, did you say, Jane? Why, I hardly know her. Are you sure it is not you or Margaret?"

"The telegram says 'Marie,' dear, strange as it is."

"But you girls are John's sisters, and I am only his brother Don's wife—and I have seen her but once—at your house-warming. The dear gentlewoman, no one could help loving her! But we must all go to her without delay."

Yes, she had wanted Marie, one whom she had met but once, yet the one among all her circle of friends who she felt was able to give her comfort and help in this hour of mortal extremity. It was Marie she looked for when life which she loved so well was passing away and she was facing the mysterious beyond. Searching for compassionate sympathy, she found it in Marie, a woman who had met life not by great acts, but by quiet, happy service to those about her.

Yes, it was to Marie's hand that Ann clung; it was to Marie's face that she looked for courage; it was to Marie that she whispered her decision and John's to begin their life together in the Church, as she and Don had begun; and at last it was on Marie's prayer that the sweet spirit took its flight to God.

Ah, it is the Christ touch, the Christ sympathy that counts in the great crises of life!

Who knows what opportunity may come to us this year? Let us live in a great spirit, then we shall be ready for a great occasion.—George Hodges.

Current Items of Interest to Friends

BALTIMORE YEARLY MEETING

Baltimore, Eutaw Street—Under the auspices of a committee of the Monthly Meeting on the dissemination of Friends' views, a lecture on "Old Fashioned Quaker Principles and Present Day Opportunities," was given on January 23d, in the Eutaw Street Meeting house in Baltimore, by William C. Dennis, of Washington, D. C. There was a good audience, many of whom are not Friends. The lecturer maintained that old fashioned Quakerism was essentially a spiritual democracy, based upon individual relations with God, and out of this relationship grew the distinctive testimonies of the past most of which are especially adapted to the needs of today. The lecture was highly appreciated.

The Y. W. C. A. of Baltimore has recently entered upon a campaign for the raising of $400,000.00 to be expended in a new building. Many of the women of the Friends' meeting are actively interested in the enterprise, and Margaret T. Carey has been chosen by the Association to be Chairman of the campaign committee.

Fishertown, Pa.—L. Oscar Moon and wife are spending three weeks this winter at Fishertown, Pennsylvania, where a year ago a neighborhood house was opened by one of the interested members. They find that it has become the social and religious center of the whole community, and has tended to unite the people of all denominations in the service of neighborhood betterment.

Washington, D. C.—February 2d has been set apart by the Meeting on Ministry and Oversight of Baltimore as "Every Member" day, by the observance of which they hope to get in touch with every member of the meeting. All the members of the pastoral committee, as well as other leading members, will be enlisted to visit those who have membership in the meeting.

CALIFORNIA YEARLY MEETING

Whittier—The Whittier Intermediate C. E. Society is doing fine work under the spur of the Efficiency Campaign. We want very much to have one hundred per cent. by Efficiency Week in February. We have seven "experts" now, who all passed the examination with ninety-five per cent. or over: Lewis Cox, Isabell Allen, Myrtle Allen, Mary Coffin, Marion McGrew, Edna and Anna Bell Taber. We are growing steadily, many new members being taken in at each business meeting. We are finding the "What-so-ever Committee" very helpful in getting the younger members interested in the society work. Last Sunday, January 11, several new comrades of the Quiet Hour were obtained among recent members, so we feel much encouraged.—Pacific Friend.

A Women's Prayer league at Whittier with a president and eight vice-presidents, one for each city precinct, has been organized by the women of the Whittier church.

Its object is first, to pray; second, to do what others are not doing. The vice-presidents are to endeavor to enlist every woman of Friends' Church in her precinct on her committee. When a new family moves into the neighborhood the woman nearest is expected to call, to tactfully find out of what church, if any, or member of W. F. M. S., C. E. or Sabbath school, and report if necessary. If she can not call, then report to the vice-president, who will look after the matter. Families moving out are also to be reported. Cases of need are to be reported to proper authorities.—Pacific Friend.

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING

Muncie—Last Sabbath was observed as "Go to Church Day" by Muncie Meeting. It was also their sixth anniversary day, and preparations had been made for a large attendance.

Ludlow Falls, Ohio—A spirit of deep interest in the salvation of souls is working throughout our Quarterly Meeting. A series of meetings held at Ludlow Falls, Ohio, by the pastor, Elwood Hinshaw, resulted in many conversions and renewals. Members of the other churches united with Friends under the clear and forceful preaching and leadership of Brother Hinshaw, who was owned and blessed of the Lord in a mighty uplift to Church and community.

Center, Ohio—A meeting of great interest is in progress at Center under the leadership of Enos Pemberton. We expect good reports from them later.

West Milton, Ohio—Christmas exercises were well arranged and carried out by our young people to the help and encouragement of all. The Sabbath School is steadily on the increase. Mid-week prayer meetings are not large, but are spiritual and strengthening to the members. Our young people are already beginning to plan for the Yearly Meeting's C. E. Convention, and we are working hard to make this a great year of soul winning and strengthening in our meeting. A revival is now in progress and promises to be a success.

Since reporting the hopeful recovery of our pastor's wife, Cora H. Kittrell, from her paralytic attack, it was discovered that she was afflicted with a cancer. After undergoing a serious operation by Dr. Sater Nixon, of Farm-land, Indiana, we are glad to report that she has returned to us again in a most hopeful condition.

Van Wert, Ohio—Our meeting united in the simultaneous campaign. The meetings from first to last were marked by intense interest. During this campaign the doctrines of the Church were especially emphasized and we feel that great good was accomplished. Two united with the Church as the result. The Bible school is taking on new life and classes are being organized for definite work. The first class to organize was the young and middle-aged married people, starting in with a membership of about twenty-five, and has already increased to an enrollment of sixty-two. Class meetings are being held monthly and great interest is manifested. One of the encouraging features in Van Wert meeting is the number of young men and ladies taking an active part in all lines of work. Three classes of young people have organized themselves and are holding meetings once a month. The Friends' Discipline is being studied, and some one is asked at these meetings to tell the duties of elders, overseers, etc. The C. E. is also increasing in interest and numbers. At our last business meeting eleven names were presented for active membership.

Richmond—The four Friends' meetings of Richmond have been engaged for the past five weeks with fourteen other churches of the city in a great tabernacle evangelistic campaign, with I. E. Honeywell as the Evangelist in charge with his party of workers. Friends have served prominently on all Committees, S. E. Nicholson being Chairman of the Managing Committee of one hundred; Edgar L. Mote being Secretary of the personal worker's league, and O. E. Fulghum Secretary of the Finance Committee. Richmond has been stirred religiously as it has not been for many years. The preaching of Mr. Honeywell and Mel Trotter, the latter being present two evenings, has been searching and effective. The converts number about 1,600. All the Friends' meetings will have a number of accessions.

Charlottesville—On the 18th, E. Gurney Hill and Folger P. Wilson, of Richmond, Indiana, attended the meeting at Charlottesville. Gurney Hill spoke in the morning and Folger Wilson in the evening. They were very much enjoyed and an inspiration, especially to the missionary work of the meeting.

IOWA YEARLY MEETING

Iowa Falls—There having been no services for several years previous to eighteen months ago, at Friends' Church, Iowa Falls, Iowa, we feel greatly rejoiced, and are praising the Lord for the present conditions we are enjoying. Davis M. Branon was secured as pastor in the autumn of 1912, who after having filled the place for ten months, resigned to engage in other work. For nearly one month we were without a pastor, but just following Yearly Meeting, James Renfrew was engaged for this place. He and his wife are doing faithful work, and our meeting has been gradually gaining. Our prayer meeting is well attended for the resident membership which is near sixty. The Monthly Meeting in October last appointed a committee to take into consideration remodeling the church building and building a parsonage. The committee has decided to undertake this work in the early spring, and reports that most of the funds necessary have been subscribed. With these improvements, we feel the work will be greatly aided.

Oskaloosa—Mary Sibbett, of Wichita, visited our meeting on a recent Sabbath, and gave two stirring addresses on temperance and purity. She was much appreciated. The Senior C. E. has organized a Quakerism Study Class with Homer L. Morris as leader. The class has made a good beginning. Sabbath audiences have increased very perceptibly since the meeting moved into the new house, and new members are being received at every monthly meeting.

Frank W. Dell spent three days with us recently, giving four expositions of Scripture, besides his lecture on "The Polarization of an Idea." These were all excellent and thoroughly enjoyed by Friends. Our W. F. M. S. is having an unusually prosperous year with a membership of seventy. They are studying "The King's Business," and have adopted the plans of having one leader for the entire course. Anna M. T. Kelsey was chosen for this position. Our men, under the leadership of the missionary committee of the Brotherhood, are reading Speer, Mott, White, and other leading writers on missions, with the result that a very encouraging interest is being awakened.

An event not soon to be forgotten was an evening dinner given by the men of the meeting to the boys of the meeting and Bible school. Some ninety ate together about equally divided between men and boys. The men served the dinner, the leading feature of which was a roasted pig with the usual accessories. After dinner games were played, and then, standing where each chanced to be when the word was given, men and boys joined in singing "Praise God from Whom all Blessings Flow," and the company was dismissed with a brief prayer by the pastor.

KANSAS YEARLY MEETING

Haviland—Arthur and Edna Chilson spent Sunday, January 18th, with the Friends at Haviland. They spoke at the morning and evening services, and aroused a new interest in the needs of the African field. They also addressed a meeting at Prairie Flower at 3:00 p. m. of the same day. They were on their way to California.

Gate—Gate Quarterly Meeting is still holding campaign missionary meetings at points where Friends hold services. H. May Smith, the Quarterly Meeting Superintendent of the missionary department, is much interested in the progress, and would like someone to address us at Quarterly Meeting, February 28th, at Gate. Who will respond?

Laurence Academy—New students have entered Laurence Academy, and new classes will be formed this week. Professor S. B. Laughlin and wife are doing excellent work in the school. Professor S. B. Laughlin gave interesting talks on his trip and work in the Orient, using a good lantern to illustrate from pictures of his own taking.

WESTERN YEARLY MEETING

White Lick Quarter—White Lick Quarterly Meeting will be held at West Union, February 13th and 14th. We anticipate a time of blessing and hopefulness.

West Union—The Men's Organized Bible Class of West Union, taught by Dr. Hubbard, played the part of the Good Samaritan in a practical way by sending $10.50 to the Japanese sufferers. "Go and do thou likewise."

WILMINGTON YEARLY MEETING

Wilmington—Teacher Ellen C. Wright gave an interesting address on Women in the Ministry to the Wilmington Friends' C. E. on the evening of January 25th.

The average attendance for the month of January at Wilmington Friends' Bible School was twenty-nine per cent. larger than any preceding January.

The Friends' Church, together with the other churches of Wilmington, observed last Sunday as "Church Attendance Day."

HAVERFORD COLLEGE

Dr. F. G. Peabody, Professor Emeritus of Ethics at Harvard University, was a guest of Haverford College during the week of January 11-17. He delivered a lecture on "The Academic Life and the Religious Life" Monday evening; spoke at the Y. M. C. A. on Wednesday evening; lectured to the Senior Ethics Class on Wednesday and Friday mornings; spoke at meeting Thursday morning, and met students informally each of the four evenings. Dr. Peabody's talks were of a practical and thought-provoking nature, and his presence with us was indeed stimulating and uplifting.

Professor Henry J. Cadbury, Yoshis Nitobe, '15, and W. H. Martwick, '16, represented Haverford College at the Kansas City Student Volunteer Convention. Their enthusiastic reports of that gathering have been of great interest to the men of the college.

The Quaker fellows of the two upper classes are meeting once each month at the home of President Sharpless for a discussion of the things of Quakerdom. "Doctrines" and "William Penn" have been the subjects of two of the meetings. The group is usually attended by from fifteen to twenty fellows, and interest has been high.

JOEL BEAN

Some tributes to the life and character of Joel Bean have been received, but have to go over until a later issue. We will give place for some of them soon.

PERSONAL MENTION

Bert Hoskinson is holding a series of meetings south of Mullinsville, Kansas.

H. E. McGrew is president of the ministerial union at Whittier, California.

Tilman Hobson has been in evangelistic work in Indiana recently and is now at work in Ohio.

Levi F. Cox will begin revival services at West Union Meeting, Indiana, in the near future.

Willard O. Trueblood, pastor of the First Friends' Church at Indianapolis, has been selected to hold religious services among the boys at Earlham College. The meetings will be held soon.

Nathan and Esther Frame are passing through deep waters of affliction, but they are realizing the presence of the Lord. Nathan is quite feeble and has not been able to attend meeting for some time.

THAT CONFERENCE OF MEN

We have received several other fine endorsements of the Conference of Men, together with one or two in opposition, which we hope to give space for next week. The proposition appears to be taking a deep hold upon the minds of many Friends.

EARLHAM COLLEGE ANNOUNCEMENTS

President Kelly announced today that a year's leave of absence has been granted Professor Millard S. Markle for next college year. Professor Markle intends to continue his study in the department of botany in the University of Chicago, with the view of securing the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. It is expected that he will return again to the college faculty at the end of his year's leave of absence.

President Kelly also announced the appointment of Dr. Raymond Binford, of Guilford College, North Carolina, to a permanent position in the Department of Biology. His title will be Professor of Zoology. The work in biology next year will be in the hands of Professor Dennis and Professor Binford. Dr. Binford is a graduate of Earlham College and received his degree of Ph.D. from the Johns Hopkins University. For some years he has held a permanent appointment as lecturer in zoology during the summer at Woods Hole, Massachusetts. This appointment he will continue in connection with his work at Earlham. Woods Hole is the rendezvous of scientists throughout the entire United States. Dr. Binford has distinguished himself as a zoologist and has already acquired a national reputation. His appointment to the faculty makes the second Doctor of Philosophy from the Johns Hopkins University, the other one being Dr. Harry N. Holmes.

EARLHAM DAY

At the last sessions of Indiana and Western Yearly Meetings a proposition to set aside one Sunday in each year as "Earlham Day," was heartily approved. The authorities of the College have designated Sunday, March 15, for this purpose. A special copy of the Earlham College Bulletin is being printed, and this and other literature will be sent to all who ask for it. It is hoped that in every meeting of the two yearly meetings the subject of Christian Education may be considered on that day or some other day near that date.

A MESSAGE FROM ENGLAND

No doubt Friends in America will be interested in learning that Leanah Hobson, who was detained in England by serious illness, is recovering. She and her husband expect to sail on the St. Paul, leaving Southampton for New York on the 28th of this month. They intend to stop in Indiana, as Leanah Hobson has decided not to return to Mount Airy, North Carolina, as pastor, the doctor having advised complete rest for a time. Leanah Hobson has labored in England for nearly a year, her husband joining her in July. Their work has been much appreciated, and their many friends wish them a safe voyage and much blessing in their home land.

BIBLE SCHOOL LESSON

February 15.

Subject—Christ's Hatred of Shams.
Lesson—Luke 11: 37-54.

Golden Text—Be not deceived; God is not mocked.—Gal. 6: 7.

Place—Perea, beyond the Jordan.

Time—Probably January A. D. 30.

Jesus is still in Perea, going about among the villages and through the country, seeking to evangelize the people, but gradually working his way toward Jerusalem, where only a few short months hence was to occur the great tragedy of human history.

This is another lesson in practical, effective goodness. Jesus always saw the moral element in every question, and over and over again discomfited the Pharisees and the insincere spirit of that age by going straight to the heart of the question under consideration, and making the people see how far the rule of custom departed from the rule of right.

*Cleanse the outside of the cup * * ** but your inward part is full of extortion and wickedness. A rickety wagon cannot be made a sound one by a coat of paint. Washing the hands will not eliminate contamination from the blood, nor contagion from the skin. Going to church will not of itself atone for a dishonest business deal or an unholy social function. No veneer of righteous deeds can be an antidote for sin. Moral purity must come from within. Get the heart pure and the life will be pure.

These ought ye to have done. The lesson is not a protest against little and unimportant conventionalities. It is rather a lesson to emphasize the things that are worth while. Good works are not to be despised, but the qualities of heart life that provoke good works are the more important. While being anxious to be clean on the outside, the greater concern should be about the life within. They are not to neglect the one, but to be more anxious about the other.

Woe. There is a wholesale and persistent pronouncement against shams and insincerity among all classes. Hypocrisy is rebuked for all the ages. Good works alone will not save. Giving charity alone will not save. The formalities of worship alone will not save. The cure for shams is not in forsaking outward practices, but in cleansing the heart. Humanity must cease to pose for what it is not, "God puts a clean heart before clean hands."

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR

February 15.

Topic—Why Every One Should Sign a Temperance Pledge. Prov. 23: 20, 21, 29-35. (Temperance Meeting.)

To one who does not need a pledge, its testimony is the important element. Thousands do not need the pledge perhaps, for their own sake, but pledge signers form an honor roll, which is foretelling the doom of the saloon.

Many a boy has signed a pledge and has not been conscious of any benefit from it, but his act perhaps has helped some other boy to sign, whose pledge has been a genuine protection in time of temptation.

The pledge is of special value to the boys and the girls, when later as young men and young women they find a place in society. Many a man has found the pledge he had taken in his boyhood a bulwark of defense when asked by his associates to drink.

Signing the pledge is taking a stand. It is an enlistment for war upon the drink habit and upon the drink traffic.

Assign topics to the members, showing the evils of drink as so many reasons for taking the pledge.

WESTERN YEARLY MEETING NOTICE

We have been unable to get any word from the following Monthly Meetings in Western Yearly Meeting concerning the total number of members: resident and non-resident: Marshall, Bloomington Quarter; Hazel Dell, Kokomo Quarter; all the Monthly Meetings in Pleasant Grove Quarter; and Stanton, in Vermilion Quarter. ## DANIEL MCPHERSON

Daniel McPherson, son of Joseph and Ruth C. McPherson, was born in Martinsville, Clinton County, Ohio, August 26, 1834. He was converted in 1854, in Grant County, Indiana, and began preaching in the Friends' Church at an early age. For twenty years he spent most of his time in evangelistic work, holding meetings in all the states from Maine to Kansas, and from Minnesota to South Carolina, thousands being converted under his ministry. He was the founder of the Friends' Church at Howard Lake, Minnesota. He was the first minister to sing in a Friends' meeting west of the Mississippi, at Salem, Henry County, Iowa, in 1876.

Coming to Iowa in 1882, from Howard Lake, Minnesota, he became pastor of the Friends' Church at Stuart for two years, then moved with his family to Des Moines in 1884.

His sainted mother, Ruth McPherson Morris, spent the last nine years of her life with him at Des Moines, going to her Heavenly home in 1909, at the ripened age of one hundred and two years.

He was always an ardent advocate of prohibition, and on November 25, 1911, the State W. C. T. U. gave him a life membership certificate, the gift coming through Willard W. C. T. U. of Des Moines. He was an active member of the Ministerial Association of Des Moines until his health failed. On Monday night, November 24th, 1913, he was stricken with paralysis, remaining unconscious until 3:00 a. m., Wednesday. On Thanksgiving Day several friends called to see him. The only sentence he was able to speak was, "I'm on my way to Glory and I've almost reached the shore."

On Saturday, November 29, 1913, with the family around his bedside, he peacefully breathed his last.

Funeral services were held at the First Friends' Church, Tuesday afternoon at 3:00, the pastor, Richard Newby, officiating, assisted by Harry R. Keates, President David M. Edwards and others. Members of the W. C. T. U. attended in a body.

ANOTHER COFFEE WRECK

What's the Use When There's an Easy Way Out

Along with the coffee habit has grown the prevalent "American Disease"—nervous prostration.

The following letter shows the way out of the trouble:

"Five years ago I was a great coffee drinker and from its use I became so nervous I could scarcely sleep at all nights. My condition grew worse and worse until finally the physician I consulted declared my troubles were due to coffee.

"But being so wedded to the beverage I did not see how I could do without it, especially at breakfast, as that meal seemed incomplete without coffee.

"On a visit, my friends deprived me of coffee to prove that it was harmful. At the end of about eight days I was less nervous but the craving for coffee was intense, so I went back to the old habit as soon as I got home and the old sleepless nights came near making a wreck of me.

"I heard of Postum and decided to try it. I did not like it at first, because, as I afterwards discovered, it was not made properly. I found, however, that when made after directions on the package, it was delicious.

"It had a soothing effect on my nerves and none of the bad effects that coffee had, so I bade farewell to coffee and have used only Postum since. The most wonderful account of the benefit to be derived from Postum could not exceed my own experience."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Write for a copy of "The Road to Wellville."

Postum now comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. Grocers sell both kinds.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

The Westtown Letter

A PIECE OF HISTORY

Westtown School was opened for pupils in the summer of 1799. It was the outcome of a concern which had rested upon Friends for many years that the youth of the Society should have better opportunities for education, and that these should be enjoyed under the influence of surroundings which expressed the Friendly idea of Christian life. These ideals have continued to be the guiding principles in the management of the school through its long history.

The opportunities for education at Westtown have not only been good, but they have continually been made better as the years have passed. The buildings have been increased in size and comfort, the school appliances have grown from nothing to a great equipment, and the course of study which began with "the three R's" and a little science, has expanded the Reading and Writing into the modern courses in English and History, and the Arithmetic into Algebra and Geometry and even to the higher mathematics. The Sciences grew into Botany, Zoology, Chemistry and Physics, and have at times included Geology and Astronomy. The languages were added, one by one, as the demand for them became manifest.

A regular course of study was formulated in 1861, and there was a single graduate in 1862, while the first class received its diplomas in the following year. For a long time the course was that of an advanced Academy, but as the trend of the pupils toward college became more general it was gradually changed to a modern college preparatory course with alternative subjects in the later years, for those who are going at once into business life. In the 114 years of its existence, over twelve thousand children have come under its care, and since 1862 eight hundred and ninety-seven have regularly graduated.

Active and efficient interest in Westtown has increased with the years. As the early pupils grew to manhood and womanhood and assumed the management of the school, they brought a personal regard to strengthen the general concern for its welfare. And so it has come to pass that the great majority of the members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting have a direct or inherited interest in Westtown, often accumulated through four generations. This gives the place a tremendous hold on the affections of our people, and this affection reacts on the school in numberless ways. What is really needed in financial aid is nearly always obtained. Concerned Friends come out to our meetings and collections, and worship with us and give us words of counsel. Our First-day evening addresses often spring from the deep concern of our Friends for our intellectual, moral, or religious uplift. The Old Scholars and the Alumni Associations are continually helping us, spending annually about $4,500.00 besides raising special funds for all sorts of purposes.

All this active manifestation of interest precludes any stagnation, and compels us to be alert, besides helping in our necessary materials and equipment. But it does far more than this. It envelops us in an atmosphere of interest and concern and good feeling, which is very obvious to all who live here, and by which even the children are strongly impressed. A person who comes to Westtown finds it more than a school. It is a religious organization, a social community, a beneficial society, and a league of pledged friendship. It has no password or grip, but the name of Westtown will bring greeting and a helping hand in hundreds of places from Maine to California.

In establishing the institution the Friends of the time gave us a liberal endowment of land. A tract a mile and a half by five-eighths, containing six hundred acres, was secured in Westtown Township, about half of whose hills and valleys were under cultivation or pasturage at the time of purchase. The buildings were erected on high ground a little south of the middle of the farm. About forty acres were set apart for the use of the school, while the rest was devoted to strictly agricultural purposes. The clearings were extended up the meadows and somewhat on the hills, but there has always been a liberal amount of forest, upwards of a hundred acres being in timber today, and nearly as much in unplowed meadow. For seventy-five years the farming followed the prevailing customs of the neighborhood, and was a source of substantial income to the school. With the opening up of the great West there came poor years for Eastern farming, in which our community slowly changed from the inherited methods of our fathers to scientific farming.

The Westtown Farm is just now in the middle of that transformation. A new dairy plant has been constructed on the most approved plans at a cost of $20,000, which was contributed by our friends. It is furnishing milk to our pupils from its tested herds, besides sending its surplus to the Philadelphia market where just now it is rated as the cleanest milk coming into the city.

A small committee containing some of our most successful fruit growers has taken over the northern end of the Farm as a department of Orchards and Forests. Thirty-five hundred apple and peach trees were planted last autumn as a beginning, and the whole department will be placed under charge of one of our graduates who, for four years, has been studying Agriculture at the State University of Ohio. He will bring to us the latest thing in scientific farming. Besides superintending his part of the Farm, he will give some lessons in Agriculture and will offer to such of our boys as desire it, the opportunity to work among the trees or on the soil and thus learn his methods. It will be but a little while before the whole of our agricultural operations will exemplify the best that is known of modern scientific farming.

Our generous domain gives us ample room for playgrounds. We have a beautiful Lake of fourteen acres, of which I will have more to say later, and the Forest and Orchard land and the open meadows furnish a great tramping ground for our children.

THOMAS K. BROWN.

Westtown, Pennsylvania.

NEWTON HADLEY

Newton Hadley, son of Alfred and Rhoda Hadley, was born near Mooresville, Indiana, February 17, 1832. He passed from this life to that beyond December 4, 1913, having lived for more than four score years a life of usefulness and helpfulness to those about him.

When he was a small boy his family removed to a farm near Bloomingdale, where he lived the life of a pioneer boy. He was educated mostly at Bloomingdale Academy, a select school under the care of Friends. In his early life for a number of years he was a successful teacher. He was always interested in helping his fellow-man and took an active interest in reform measures.

He felt a definite call to the ministry, and engaged in that work throughout his long life, laboring in Watseka, Mountain Home, Alabama, and Hiawatha, Nebraska.

He was married December 5, 1855, to Mary Thompson, of Hopewell, Illinois, and together they traversed life's pathway, sometimes in joy, sometimes in sadness, until four years after their golden wedding, when she slipped from his side into the greater and broader life.

In the passing away of Newton Hadley, the Church loses one of its strongest and most faithful workers. The spirit of the lowly Nazarene in whose service he labored with such tenderness and sympathy, was reflected in every act of his daily life. He did indeed, follow in the footsteps of his Master and went about doing good. None were too lowly for him to carry to them the glad tidings of the "Old, old Story," or none too mighty but to them he would bring the same simple story of the Christ and the cross. His trust in his Heavenly Father was beautiful in its completeness and simplicity. His love for humanity seemed perfect, and oftentimes with outstretched hands would he weep over erring ones, as Christ must have wept over Jerusalem. His gentleness made him great. His life was one of contentment and repose shedding a sweet fragrance over us all and emitting such benedictions as can only come from those whose lives are hid with Christ in God.

Settlers a Year

Immigration figures show that the population of Canada increased during 1913, by the addition of 400,000 new settlers from the United States and Europe. Most of these have gone on farms in provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Lord William Percy, an English Nobleman, says:

"The possibilities and opportunities offered by the Canadian West are so infinitely greater than those which exist in England, that it seems absurd to think that people should be impeded from coming to the country where they can most easily and certainly improve their position."

New districts are being opened up, which will make accessible a great number of homesteads in districts especially adapted to mixed farming and grain raising.

Christ's Winsomeness

BY MRS. NEWELL DWIGHT HILLIS

A winsome voice my Master had,
He spoke and strong men rose
And in their fishing garments clad Stayed not for day to close.
And one who at the treasury sat
Looked up, and seeing, came
And all his gains and friends forgot
At hearing of His name.
So winsome was my Master's voice,
They and the whole wide world rejoice.

A winsome touch my Master had,
The suffering ones arose
And, doing as He gently bade,
Pain vanished and their woes.
The sick and heavy-laden came
And something in His face
Brought rest and healing strength. The lame
Crept close with stumbling pace.
So winsome was my Master's touch,
The whole wide world felt never such.

A winsome smile my Master had,
The little children rose
Though friends and followers forbade,
Him as their own they chose,
And eager ran to His embrace
And straightway had no fear,
For something in His loving face
Assured them they were dear.
So winsome when my Master smiled
His very own were man and child.

"American Friend Day"

We ask all who are interested in the success of THE AMERICAN FRIEND to remember that Sabbath, March 1st, has been set apart as "AMERICAN FRIEND DAY" for all Friends meetings in America. It is hoped that in every meeting, some consideration will be given to the needs of our Church periodical. In many places, the burden of the matter will no doubt be reflected in the sermons and in the prayers.

In any case, we would suggest that at the close of the service, someone present the needs of the paper in a brief talk. It should be emphasized that the paper now belongs to the Five Years Meeting, that its mission is to build up the Society of Friends in America, that no one can render the best service for the Church unless kept in touch with the movements of Friends generally, that the paper needs the patronage of all Friends, and all Friends need the paper, that the paper is a department of the Church and ought to be supported as loyally as any other important department.

Upon that day, if the matter is given proper attention, and upon succeeding days, if some one is secured to canvass the membership, not fewer than 2,000 new subscribers ought to be added to our lists. The paper must have not fewer than this number, if it is to fulfill its rightful mission in the denomination.

As a special inducement, new subscriptions can be taken at that time for the remainder of the year at $1.00. This day ought to stir the entire Church with new zeal for our denominational periodical. A situation exists which can only be met by some such effort as this. Remember to do your part in the observance of "AMERICAN FRIEND DAY" on March 1st.

Is a Religious Upheaval Imminent?

The Philadelphia North American has conceived and carried out a project of asking persons who have opportunity to discern the signs of the times the following questions:

"1. Does your observation of the present time lead you to believe that some sort of spiritual awakening, or upheaval, or fresh expression, is impending or imminent?

"2. If so, what form, in your judgment, is this revival or experience, or manifestation, likely to take?"

The answers to the questions which have been published so far have been very interesting. Here are three brief replies:

Fred B. Smith—"I am tremendously interested in the present-day awakening in vital religious things, which I believe is the most marked that the world has ever witnessed. Great-hearted men all over have been praying for a revival of religion. I do not think all of them can recognize the revival when it arrives; but I believe it is on. It is expressing itself in a moral awakening that is not only calling individuals to repentance, but institutions, organizations, cities and nations."

Gifford Pinchot—" (1) I am entirely convinced that, as you put it, 'some sort of spiritual awakening, or upheaval, or fresh expression,' is not only imminent, but actually present among us, and also in a majority of the other nations of the world. (2) As I see it, this awakening is likely to take two principal forms. One of these will consist in bringing the church, that is to say, religion, more constantly and effectively into daily life as a factor in the solution of the problems of nation, state and city, as well as those of the individual. The other is a demand unprecedented in the history of our country, that our government, our institutions and our natural wealth shall be devoted in a degree hitherto unknown to the welfare of the men, women and children of whom the nation is composed. These two movements in the church and in the state have already made such progress, in my judgment, that their success is assured."

John R. Mott—"We need not look for a breaking out of a new social, ethical and religious movement. If you know the facts, you see that already and now in most parts of the world there is more than at any other time in the past nothing less than a great revival of social, ethical and religious interest and activity. This is true in the far East and in the near West and in the most remote parts of Europe. We are beginning to realize it right here in America."

In the World of Action

The Bible—During the past year the Bible has been translated into nine new languages. It can now be read in more than 500 tongues and dialects. Thus is the missionary cause being extended to the ends of the earth.

Refusing Liquor Advertisements—The Pittsburg Gazette-Times and the Chronicle-Telegraph of the same city, which are owned and controlled by Senator George Oliver, have announced that they will accept no liquor advertisements henceforth. This action is taken so that the advertising columns will be in accord with the editorial policy, which favors local option.

The Church Must Be Faithful

"To obey is better than sacrifice." To follow Jehovah was more important than the mere act of observing the ceremonial law. Beyond the sacrificial act was the motive that prompted it and that rendered it propitiatory. At most the offering typified the sacrificial death on the Cross that was to atone for all sin, but even this does not avail to avert the penalties of a broken law, unless the transgressor accepts it by faith as being personally applied. Obedience to the Divine law is the basic principle of redemption through Christ Jesus and is the fundamental element in that faithful discipleship which must ever characterize the Church of God.

The Church must be true to the Divine Commission or it ceases to be a Church in the gospel sense. A lighthouse shaft rises from a rocky ledge off Land's End. Its faithful light, year in and year out, is the token of safety to every storm-tossed mariner who comes within the circle of its gleam. Should that light fail for but a single hour on some stormy night, no one could foretell the toll of death which might easily follow. Not less faithful than the light in that old shaft must be the light of the Christian Church. Let its light be dimmed for any cause, or let its message ring untrue in any age, and skepticism and disobedience will reap an awful harvest.

Figures seem to indicate that the Church in America is not keeping pace with the increase in population. The gain in Church membership in 1913 over the previous year is less than two per cent. Friends have actually lost so far as our American meetings are concerned. Never before has the Church universal had so much culture, so much wealth, such splendid organization, but with all its equipment it often seems strangely lacking in power, in ability to win the masses. "Power belongeth to God." He stands ready to transmit His power to His followers as much as in any age, and the world seems ready for the truth, as in no other day, yet oftentimes the energy of the Church seems wholly expended in running its own machinery with slight visible results. May it not be that the Church has lost something of that fine sense of obedient and faithful discipleship which is the guarantee of gospel success? In the presence of wordly tendencies perhaps the Church has lowered somewhat the standard of its testimony. In the presence of society, of big business, of practical politics, perhaps it has compromised with wrong until it has lost the keen edge of religious zeal. Perhaps in trying to be popular the Church has ceased to be faithful.

Love is the impelling force of faithful service, no less than of faithful living. Faithfulness is inborn, a quality of life that has root in Christian living. "For the love of Christ constraineth us." Such is the drawing power of Divine affection. Not as a slave driven to an unpleasant task, not as a servant obedient for the sake of material compensation, not as one who seeks to escape the lashings of an accusing conscience, must the Church be faithful to its mighty trust, but as the son, impelled by filial love, runs upon the errands of the household and proves his right to enjoy the family life by loving, faithful devotion to all its requirements. The Church must not only preach a full-rounded gospel that saves to the uttermost; it must not only extend the hand of helpfulness to every sinful man and woman, but it must show the spirit of genuine fellowship and Christian affection that will win them for the Kingdom of God.

Never has the demand for faithfulness been laid more heavily upon the Christian Church. There are many indications that the twentieth century is to be increasingly and predominantly religious. Great humanitarian problems that have their tap root in the obligations and requirements of the Christian life, are pressing for solution. Here the Church must give no uncertain sound. Holiness is at variance with sin whether in life and character or in the outward deeds of sinful men. Humanity must be won to the holy life, and the Church has no time to be idle. This world can make no provision for the deepest yearnings of the human soul. If any message ever supplies that need, it must come from the Church of Christ.

The mission of the Church is with the masses. Christ never preached a religion of aristocracy. The message of God is to all men, and when the Church ceases to be democratic failure will be written upon its forehead. The Church must be faithful to its message, faithful to the Word, faithful to the guidance of the Spirit, faithful to its youth, to the community, to the problems that affect human life and destiny, to the task of world redemption. Faithlessness is disobedience and disobedience is sin.

Manhood Versus Rum

A champion of the liquor traffic, who is honest enough to speak the truth to those most concerned in the business, said recently: "When the people decide that the truth is being told about the alcoholic liquor trade, the money value will not count, for conscience aroused puts the value of a man above all other things." Nothing more significant has been uttered upon the much discussed liquor question.

When the beverage liquor traffic is destroyed—as it is going to be—the last arguments will not be economic or financial or physiological, but they will be the moral arguments that show how manhood is being wrecked, the spiritual arguments that indicate how souls are being lost by this unholy trade. A newspaper recently said: "It (the liquor trade) does not aid the purification of municipal, state or national administration. Why? Because it has to ask immunity for its own lawlessness." In a way the public conscience is beginning to understand the inherent evil of the saloon, and even the average conscience cannot be counted upon to condone flagrant evil permanently.

The liquor fraternity is waging a losing fight. Science, economy, physiology are all against it, but more than all morality is against it and the ban of Jehovah is upon it. Whoever can measure the worth of a boy or of a man can measure in some degree the character-destroying power of the saloon. As a matter of self-preservation, the American nation must unlock arms with the liquor business. There is a new star in the horizon, and it is the star of deliverance from the absolutism of rum. The American people have started in to put an end to national inebriety, and every Christian force should be enlisted in the struggle.

George Fox: A Spiritual Pioneer

(Editorial, Western Christian Advocate, January 28.)

The late Hugh Price Hughes once said: "He who desires to understand the real history of the English people during the seventeenth, eighteenth and nineteenth centuries should read most carefully three books—George Fox's Journal, John Wesley's Journal, and J. H. Newman's Apologia."

The biography of George Fox is intensely interesting. The founder of the Quaker Communion—known now as "Friends"—has been described by a historian as "one of the most extraordinary men that ever lived." Although born nearly three hundred years ago, there is a very modern sound to much of his doctrine and preaching. He protested most vigorously against formality in religion, and constantly exhorted Christians to seek a deeper spirituality. In his reaction against what he felt to be the empty declamations of the pulpits of his time and the profitless ceremonialism, he practiced and urged the silent communion with God, which has been the distinctive feature to this day of the body of Quakers, so nicknamed because Fox told his people to tremble at the Word of the Lord, but the name they adopted for themselves was that of "Friends," in accordance with Christ's words, "Ye are My friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you."

Fox preached up and down the country and attracted great crowds and large sympathy, but he had to endure much persecution for his views, and passed much of his time in jail—under charge of being "a blasphemous and heretic and seducer."

A writer describing the era said: "We seem to be steeped in liquors or to be the dizzy island. We drink as if we were sponges." Fox was shocked at this prevailing intemperance, and preached earnestly—and, considering the age in which he lived, most remarkably in advance of his times—in favor of temperance and sobriety.

His stand, with that of his followers, against war and in favor of universal peace marks him and them in this day of peace and arbitration as notable pioneers in a great humanitarian movement. For many years the peace proclamations of the Quakers were like voices crying in the wilderness, none heeding except to ignore and ridicule as foolish dreams and idealism. But in this century they are beholding their reward.

Fox was deeply moved and grieved at heart at seeing so much poverty, so many beggars, and so much hard-heartedness among those that had professed the name of Christ. He thus became a forerunner of those working in behalf of the "submerged tenth" today. Once, in London, we sought out his burial-place, and were surprised to find that his grave was marked only by a small and very plain stone. The plot of ground adjoins the fine building of the Friends, where evangelistic and social-welfare work is carried on. We expressed ourselves to the superintendent, saying that we thought a suitable monument ought to be erected over the sleeping-place of such a wonderful man. But the superintendent's answer was full of meaning, and has much suggestiveness for ourselves. "This is his monument!" he said, indicating the memorial building and its numerous philanthropic activities.

"Hat worship" was to Fox to be enumerated among the sins of his time, and he had a good deal to say about it. He considered that to take off the hat to any one was an act of worship. "Friends," when in meeting, took off their hats only when they offered prayer. But in his Journal, Fox writes: "The Lord forbade me to put off my hat to any, high or low; and I was required to 'Thee' and 'Thou' all men and women, without any respect to rich or poor, great or small." "He did not intend to be discourteous," writes a biographer; "but so much deference was paid in those days to people in a high social position, little being thought of their character as compared with their office, that Fox felt it altogether contrary to the spirit of Christ. The fact of the persecution which arose because he would not take off his hat to the priests, professors, and magistrates shows how much they cared for this shallow homage, and he exclaims: 'O, the rage and scorn, the heat and fury that arose! O, the blows, punchings, beatings, and imprisonments that we underwent for not putting off our hats to men!'"

Brave soul! Would that he were alive today to set us an example which might correct much of the subserviency, obsequiousness, and miserable flunkeyism which characterizes the attitude of average society toward men who possess large or enormous wealth—and but little else! Would that George Fox could come to life again with his manly scorn of "hat worship," with all the knee-crooking and kow-towing involved, and, by his example, stiffen our spines so that we on our part should not display such abjectness in the presence of Old Moneybags—so that we should better preserve our self-respect and thereby announce to the world, not with braggadocio, but with a firm, independent modesty, that worth is not all in dollars, but much more in culture, character, service, and influence!

But it is in regard to George Fox's conception of Christianity as primarily a spiritual religion that he relates himself to the work of Wesley, Whitefield, Edwards, Moody, and all the great evangelists, as well as to the most evident religious need of this century.

During Fox's early life the Episcopal Church, under Archbishop Laud, was ruling England with an iron hand. Nothing was tolerated which seemed to be inconsistent with Episcopal creed or worship. Tolerance was nowhere known. But Fox, like Bunyan and John Wesley, experienced the deep work of the Holy Spirit within his heart in poignant conviction of sin. He sought out the "great professors" and the "priests" to obtain their direction for light and the easement of his conscience. They suggested his taking physic, drinking beer, smoking, and singing psalms!

Then Fox turned to God direct and, after a time of struggle and sadness, entered into rest. God gave him a message to deliver which occupied the remainder of his life. "Dost thou call this (the steeple-house) a church?" he said to a certain priest. "The Church is the pillar and ground of truth, made up of living stones, living members, a spiritual household which Christ is the head of; but He is not the head of a mixed multitude or of an old house made up of lime, stones and wood." In the churches, at the markets and fairs, and in all places of public resort multitudes flocked to hear him preach. "I told them," he said, "that all their preaching, baptism and sacrifices would never sanctify them, and bid them look unto Christ in them and not to men; for it is Christ that sanctifies.

I told them they were not to dispute of God and Christ, but to obey." In his preaching he declared that "God was come to teach His people by His Spirit, and to bring them off from their old ways, religions, Churches, and worships." Set forms of worship, with images and crosses and numerous holy days, seemed to him at variance with worship in spirit and truth, and provoked his protest. He consistently fought acquiescence in the prevalent, low condition of spiritual life, and perpetually taught there must be a return to the purity and simplicity of the early days of Christianity, and that to walk with God may be a daily experience. He affirmed that the Holy Scriptures were given forth by the Spirit of God, and therefore all must come to the same Spirit and have Him dwelling in their hearts, if they would understand the teaching of the Book. He thoroughly believed that the letter killeth, but the Spirit giveth life. He sought consequently to emancipate the people from all Jewish ceremonies, from men's inventions, and vain traditions. As one of his followers interpreted him, "Religion should be not an opinion, but Christ Jesus, the power of God, who is the Savior."

We might enlarge upon other views of this marvelous man, such as his conscientious objection to court-oaths, tithes, the bearing of arms in the King's service. He lived during the time of civil war, and was often pressed to take up arms against Charles Stuart. But he told those who thus urged him that he knew from whence all wars arose, even from lust, according to James' doctrine, and that he lived in virtue of that life and power that took away the occasion of all wars. The soldiers desired to make him a captain over them, but he steadily refused, saying that "he had come into the covenant of peace, which was before wars and strifes were."

Such was this undaunted soldier of Jesus Christ. He was mobbed and stoned and imprisoned again and again in the loathsome dungeons of that century, and thousands of his followers shared his fate. America must forever be indebted to the man who inspired the life and services of William Penn. Georgiana King Lewis has written a brief but most readable sketch of his life, and portrayed a character which, even after the lapse of so many years, speaks to us of this day with profound suggestiveness and impressiveness. Says this biographer: "It is impossible to estimate how far the teaching of Fox has influenced the character of the various Christian communities of today. Carlyle wrote, 'No grander thing was ever done than when George Fox went forth determined to find Truth for himself and to battle for it against all superstition, bigotry, and intolerance.' The early Quakers did not rest their faith on a Church or on texts of Scripture. They made practical experiment of Christianity from the inside. Many stand outside today because they do not listen to the voice of God speaking directly to the heart of man. George Fox bade his hearers have faith, not in a scheme or doctrine, but in God, who has revealed Himself in Jesus Christ. They acted on the principle, 'He that doeth the will of God shall know of the doctrine.' Those who are obedient to the light they possess will grow to an ever-widening perception of the truth. Quakerism has now a message for the world. Many, very many, sincere souls are chafing against the limitations that encircle them in creed and ritual, in form and symbol, and if they but knew of the glorious liberty they would find in the infinite possibilities of Quakerism, they would hail it with delight."

And the same thing we sincerely believe may be said of Methodism. For John and Charles Wesley and the early and later Methodists put their emphasis also on the spiritual content of the Scriptures, on Christianity not as a form, a ritual, or a creed, but on an experience of the Christ and His salvation within the heart. And in this confused time of multitudinous speculation such a practical religion offers to all perplexed and burdened souls liberty and joy in the Lord.

Doing Our Best With the Bible School

BY WALTER W. HAVILAND

(A Paper read at Baltimore Meeting.)

I want to make my acknowledgments to three valuable sources of help, for the benefit of any one who cares to find out the best that is being thought and done in connection with Bible study and Bible Schools. These are the Biblical World, a monthly magazine, which calls itself "a journal of the awakening church"; Religious Education, the journal of the Religious Education Association; and Efficiency in the Sunday School, a book by Henry F. Cope, which contains the best and most recent expert advice on the development of efficiency in our Bible Schools. If there are any suggestions of value in what I have to present, they will have come to me in large part through these three sources of help. I recommend them, and particularly Dr. Cope's book, to those who have time and inclination to study the best and most practical thought of our time on the subject.

What is the Bible School, anyway? It is the school of the church. Its object is to teach religious truth, and train in Christian character and service. The thought was expressed extremely well and a little more fully in the report of your Committee on Bible Schools to the Yearly Meeting two years ago. Let me read the paragraph:

The task of the Bible School is that of instructing its members in the history of the progressive revelation of God to man, as recorded and interpreted in the various books of the Bible, in a way such that its members will be brought to conform their lives with the will of God, as revealed in Jesus; and to unite with the organized Church in the work of extending His kingdom on earth.

I sometimes think the Bible School is more of a religious necessity for the Society of Friends than for other denominations. It is needed to supplement, or complement, our meetings for worship. These meetings, when held in accordance with the Quaker tradition, are devotional rather than intellectual, inspirational rather than instructional.

The Bible School gives opportunity for the exercise of gifts, which often do not appear in the times set apart for worship. The prophetic ministry is doubtless the highest type of ministry and we want more of it; but there is just as real a need for the ministry of the religious teacher, and the Bible School is a sure place for its development and service. My concern tonight, if I have a concern, is that we may raise this most important department of the work of the church, possibly the most important, to its highest power.

There are three elemental things in every Bible School—the pupils, the teachers, and the teaching.

1. The pupils. Since it is the "school of the church," the whole meeting ought to be taught religious truth and trained in Christian character and service in the Bible School. We want to make it the common interest and concern of everybody, young and old, in the meeting. Do not let it be the concern of two or three Friends. Do not let these few dare to carry it by themselves. Make everybody feel you need his help and support.

Don't be satisfied even if you have all the meeting members. Aim to get everybody within reach under the influence of your school. Get in touch with everybody just as if you were life insurance agents, as in a very high and real sense you are. Find out all about your neighbors who do not go to a Bible School. Make a card catalogue, perhaps, and try to make your school a worthy place for them to come to. If you do not have what they need, and can get it, get it, and then, get them. One of the best departments of a school is the Extension Department, which should study systematically how the school may extend its influence.

There are "shut-ins" and "shut-outs" who can be connected with the work of the school by a "Home Department." I know one woman who keeps in touch with forty people, who do the work of a Bible class, without ever attending it. There are often possibilities for branch schools in near by or more remote neighborhoods, classes in factories during noon hours, and week-day evening classes, for those who find it hard to get to the regular session of the school. One of the most successful Bible classes I know is a Friday evening Bible class for young married people, which meets around and is led in rotation by its various members. We must get everybody interested and concerned. There is a danger that a meeting will give its strength to other causes, and neglect the training of its own children. Half the time parents do not know what sort of stuff is being dealt out to their children. It is their religious business to see that what is given is the best that can be given. What shall we say, then, about pupils for our Bible School? Do your best to get everybody in the meeting and everybody within reach into the work of the Bible School, and let them understand that they are there for serious business.

2. The teachers. If you have your scholars you next want teachers. We must have the very best teachers we can get. The church has a right to say to her ablest and best equipped men and women: "We want you to teach us and our children the Bible." We have the right and are under obligations to develop leadership. The church should lay its hands—and may not this be the apostolic doctrine of laying on of hands?—it should lay its hands on men and women possessing the qualifications—intelligence, ability, energy, persistence, sympathy, and consecration—and fit them by the best training it can give them for the work—praying that they may indeed receive the Holy Spirit. We Friends cannot pick and choose our ministers so easily. We have to put up with what is given us in meeting, more or less, even though it be a stale and chronic ministry.

I am tempted here to digress and say that the quality of our ministry is poorer than it need be, because we have no way to bring out the latent ministry of sensitive and complex-minded souls, who shrink or protest against public service. I have hopes of a constructive eldership, that can build up a more efficient ministry.

Whatever difficulties in theory and practice beset the improvement of our ministry, we cannot plead these difficulties in the improvement of our teachers. Our teachers, to do their best, need to be trained in the knowledge of child nature and in the principles of teaching, as well as in the truths and facts of the Bible. A course of training—forty lessons, forty minutes, and forty sentences to each, will not train a teacher, though it may set helpful plans in motion, and open paths into which one may profitably enter. To learn how to get down to hard work in preparation for serious teaching is the most essential thing in teachers' training. The work of the Bible School is real work and must not be trifled with. It makes the strongest demands upon the powers of those who engage in it, so that the calling is a dignified and worthy one. Not only the Biblical material, but those to whom it is to be presented, must be studied carefully and thoroughly. The great thing for the teacher to discover in every lesson is the point of contact between the points of the lesson and the lives of the members of his class.

I would not have it understood that I make light of the admirable courses in teacher training which have been prepared; on the contrary, I recommend them; but I suggest that, valuable as they are, they are only the beginning of teacher training. The mastery of a text-book and a diploma, even though it be framed, do not guarantee a good teacher. A good teacher progresses and improves by continued preparation and thought on the problems which are new with every new phase in the development of the members of his class. It is far better to learn to think than to recite a manual ever so glibly. Teachers' meetings may be so formal and cut and dried as to be of little use or of none at all. But on the other hand, gatherings of the officers and teachers of the school to consider definite problems or difficulties may be of the greatest value. Dr. Cope's book suggests the development of home-made experts by this kind of teachers' meetings or conferences. One teacher or officer can be set to work looking up information and consulting authorities on teacher training; another on the matter of enlisting the recruits; another on the course of study and the grading of classes; still another on the physical equipment of the school. To quote Dr. Cope, "The way to make experts is to cease thinking of all the business of the school as everybody's business, to agree on a separation of tasks among the teachers, officers and any others who will work at them—for there are many who would come into school service under this plan—and to hold each one responsible for knowledge of his own special focal point."

Report of the Committee on Secondary Education II.

The College Preparatory Department

The report of the Committee on Secondary Education, submitted to the meeting at Cleveland a year ago, contained the following sentence: "The best educational thought and the wisest educational statesmanship of our times are rightly opposed to the college preparatory school." The paragraph containing this sentence was referred to the Committee for further investigation and revision.

Pursuant to this instruction, the Chairman of the Committee sent a questionnaire containing the following questions to a number of the colleges:

Do you have a preparatory department?

If so, how many students enrolled?

Is the number increasing or decreasing?

Do you favor or oppose the presence of preparatory students on your campus? Why?

The questionnaire was sent to the Presidents of the colleges of the following churches: Baptist, Friends, Lutheran, Methodist Episcopal, Presbyterian, Reformed; the lists of the colleges of the other churches not being received in time to utilize them. Replies were received from 101 colleges, 79 of which report Preparatory Departments and 22 of which report none. Of the 79 having Preparatory Departments, 49 say they favor them, and 21 do not favor them. Of the 22 reporting no Preparatory Department, 18 are opposed to the principle involved in having preparatory students on the college campus; the other four leave the question unanswered. In the schools whose Presidents favor the Preparatory Department there are 5,512 students, an average of nearly 112. In the schools whose Presidents do not favor the Preparatory Departments there are 1,798 students, an average of nearly 86. If two very large Preparatory Departments were omitted, however, the average enrollment in the two cases would be practically the same. Thirty report that the number of students is increasing, 27 that the number is decreasing and 21 that the number remains about the same or fluctuates.

Fifty-one Presidents favor the Preparatory Department or 65 per cent of those having them. A few defend the Preparatory Department on the ground of the stimulating effect on the students, the helpful Christian influences, the presence of belated students and better quality of work. Two of the colleges reporting need this department as a practice school for prospective teachers. Several of the schools reporting are small, and the Preparatory Department enrolls most of the students. The prevailing opinion seems to be that such department is a temporary expedient made necessary by inadequate secondary schools independent of the college. Speaking generally, the colleges which do not have Preparatory Departments are the older, better endowed, and better equipped institutions which are not held down by local conditions and are freer than the other colleges to carry out their inclinations. It is believed by those not favoring the Preparatory Department that under the usual conditions the standards of scholarship, character and administration are lowered if there are preparatory students on the campus and that the unity of spirit among both groups of students is destroyed.

There are throughout the country several Preparatory Departments under college control but with separate organizations and on a separate campus. It seems to be clear that this is the ideal type of Preparatory Department, if such department is to be maintained. Even this arrangement, however, is likely to cause a rivalry with other preparatory schools and to introduce a number of problems which most college authorities would not care to be responsible for. The Committee is still of the opinion, therefore, that the college preparatory school on the same campus and under the same management as the college itself does not offer the best opportunities for secondary students, and is a hindrance to the highest type of college work.

The Committee is equally convinced that there are numerous reasons of sound educational character why a limited number of Academies should be maintained by the Church. Under no circumstances, however, should these schools be allowed to continue if they cannot offer as good advantages educationally and better advantages socially and morally than the surrounding schools of the same grade under state control.

The World in Action

Episcopalians and Christian Unity. The Anglican Church is trembling with fear because in the East African field two of their bishops have fraternized with missionaries of other denominations. Yet at this very time a delegation from the United States is in England conferring with our English Episcopalian friends about a world's conference on the subject of Christian unity. Until the American bishops of the Episcopalian Church remove the bar to fellowship with the Federal Council of Churches, and until the Anglican Church refuses to be rent asunder because of like fellowship in the foreign field, the outlook for Christian unity is not assuring.

A Monthly Meeting Chronicle

BY JUNIUS JUNIOR

V.

The May session of Slow Valley Monthly Meeting was an occasion long to be remembered in the history of that body. The congregation did not yet by any means see eye to eye, and the spirit of controversy was in the air, so difficult was it to break through the environs of custom into the bright light of new opportunities. But to certain of the members had come not only a vision that was impelling, but a new sense of obligation and responsibility in Christian service that demanded obedience henceforth as the price of that rest of soul which is the heritage of faithful discipleship. For such as these there could be no turning back. Not only the destiny of the meeting, but that of the community was at stake, and the test of their ability to help save the world was to be their ability to help save the neighborhood.

Despite the busy season, there was an attendance of sixty-nine members, which, with three exceptions, was the record attendance of the Monthly Meeting. The season of devotion was unusually impressive, and when the Clerk read the opening minute, many hearts were still under the spell of a new sense of the presence of the Holy Spirit.

Four delegates were named to the ensuing Quarterly Meeting, which was to be held at Newtown in two weeks, and the report to that body was found to breathe something of the solicitude and the awakened interest which was rapidly characterizing the thought and deliberations of the local congregation. Several of the committees made informal reports, and it was noticeable that particularly the Bible School and Foreign Mission reports were unusually optimistic in their tone.

Then came the second installment of the report of the special committee on the state of the meeting, and the gathered company became still in anticipation of new revelations, but whether they would be hopeful or discouraging nobody knew. The face of the chairman bore an unusually serious look as he arose to present the report.

Without preliminary remarks he proceeded to read. There was a passing reference to what had been reported a month before. The Committee had felt more keenly than at first the responsibility which this investigation involved. The report cited the fact that with only a few exceptions little interest was manifested in the affairs of the meeting on the part of the young people; that few of them ever attended a business session, that they appeared to graduate out of the Bible School at an early age, and that few of them were apparently professing Christians.

With startling truthfulness the report cited practices among the youth of the community not in keeping with the high professions of spiritual experience which had always characterized Friends. A baseball game on the previous Sabbath afternoon had included as participants, eight of the Quaker boys. The fact was suppressed, however, that one of these youths was a son of an elder and another the son of a teacher in the Bible School. The Committee was inclined to excuse the boys, however, when it suggested that unless the meeting had the power to interest the young people, and unless it could utilize their energies in some kind of religious work, it was not surprising that they sought and found some other outlet for the exercise of their youthful activities. The report deplored the abandonment of the C. E. Society some four years ago.

The tendency of several families to spend their Sabbaths in visiting, or in taking automobile or inter-urban rides to the neglect of the meetings for worship was condemned in vigorous language. It was found that the weekly prayer meeting only averaged an attendance of thirteen, and upon the whole the meeting needed to be revived internally if it was to be the influence for righteousness in the community that it ought to be. As far as could be ascertained the families that had family worship were fewer than fifteen.

The report made three recommendations:

1. That the members individually and as a congregation prostrate themselves before the Lord in humility and in prayer for a revival of the work of grace in their hearts, and for the Divine anointing that would send them out to touch other lives in the community in behalf of the Christian life.

2. That a committee be named with instructions to investigate the organism of the meeting and report any changes which would seem to promise better results in the work of the committees and especially in the finances of the meeting.

3. That a committee be appointed to look after the indifferent members, with a view to securing their attendance at the various Church services, and getting active co-operation in the work of the Church.

Finally it was suggested that the committee on the state of the meeting be continued for further investigation.

A period of silence followed the reading which grew almost painful. Slow Valley Meeting was looking into a mirror which revealed shortcomings of which they had been dimly conscious, if at all. The pastor led the discussion, but was considerably at sea as to what ought to be done. The resident minister approved the recommendations, and felt that a turning point in the meeting had been reached. Several others spoke briefly but approvingly of the report.

The retired farmer was apparently grouchy, and intimated that the committee was uncovering distasteful happenings that, while they were to be deplored, could not be helped. The old physician hoped that the Monthly Meeting would not descend to the level of fault-finding and gave quite a dissertation against that sin. The school teacher was enthusiastic over the trend of events, and believed that God was calling them to a better destiny. One of the women elders talked about the frailties of the flesh and rehearsed the good old days when all her family had to go to meeting. She was afraid that Friends were forgetting their ancient precepts. Another woman did not see how conditions could be improved, while one of the men defended the tendency of the youth to engage in innocent amusements.

Thus the discussion went on, not overly friendly at times, until the farmer in a ten-minute talk brought the meeting back to the recommendations of the Committee and proposed that they be accepted. He said that in the presence of disease they could do no less than to try some remedy, and to him the recommendations were practical. He emphasized the need of a prayerful attitude and expressed the belief that the Holy Spirit was waiting to lead the meeting into a new and joyous experience if only the members had a willingness to follow His guidance. He suggested that if a committee were appointed it should investigate the United Mission campaign movement about which he had recently seen a notice in one of the religious papers, and which gave promise of interesting the Churches in a larger way in the varied tasks which were claiming their attention.

The proposition prevailed in the face of some opposition, and the Clerk recorded a minute exhorting the membership to faithful and earnest prayer that all might be in their proper place, ready for any service to which the Lord may call. The two special committees were formed, Number 2 being headed by our farmer friend, while the young teacher led the names on Committee Number 3. The committee on the state of the meeting was continued for further service, and after a season of earnest prayer, the Clerk read the concluding minute. Slow Valley Meeting was slowly emerging from a rut that had well nigh engulfed it, and its horizon was broadening with a hopefulness that was encouraging.

John R. Mott—The Continent quotes a shrewd Chinaman as saying that John R. Mott rendered his best service to China when he refused the American Ambassadorship to that country. It was not denied that he was capable of filling the position, but the refusal gave to China a new estimation of the importance which a consecrated man puts upon religion.

Over 300 new houses were built, and new buildings already planned for 1914 will cost over one million dollars. It has the lowest tax rate of any city of its class in Illinois.

Current Items of Interest to Friends

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING

Fairmount.—The most successful revival held at the Friends' Church in recent years came to a close Sunday evening, January 25, after three weeks' duration. The entire series of meetings was characterized by deep earnestness, much interest and good attendance on the part of people from the various churches of the town. Lindley A. Wells has a method different from most of the modern evangelists. He uses no tricks of oratory, nor sensational methods to attract attention, but by sane, logical sermons, fraught with the human interest element, he appeals to the intelligence as well as sympathies of his hearers. A more able minister has seldom been heard in Fairmount. The attendance at the three meetings on the last Sunday was excellent, the evening service attracting an audience which crowded the house. A free-will offering amounting to more than $300.00 was taken for the evangelist Sunday morning. Other contributions have been given privately, making a total of $338.00. Robert Morris of Taylor University, whose singing was most acceptable during the meetings, will be accorded a generous amount for his services. The conversions, renewals, and definite blessings number more than one hundred.—Fairmount News.

New Castle.—Twenty-five new members have been taken into the New Castle meeting in the three months that Dalton H. Lewis has been with us. Sunday morning, January 25th, sixteen members were received; this being the closing Sunday of the special services. Throughout the week the attendance and interest were splendid, and the house was filled Sunday morning. The singing of the gospel hymns was a feature in all the services, and special music was also an additional source of helpfulness. At the close of the service Sunday morning, "the doors of the Church" were opened for the reception of members, and sixteen were added to the membership, bringing the total up to about two hundred and seventy.

One of the most successful and enjoyable social functions in connection with church work that has recently taken place in New Castle, was the banquet given the men of the Friends' Church recently. The audience room of the church was stripped of practically all its ordinary furnishings, and two tables, each more than forty feet in length, provided for the guests of the evening. Pink was the color scheme used for decorations throughout, and on the table, and at each plate, were pink carnations. At 8:15 o'clock, Dalton H. Lewis, the pastor, announced that all was in readiness for the banquet, and each gentleman was asked to select his place, and to stand behind his chair while Morton C. Pearson, of Indianapolis, invoked God's blessing upon the assembled company, the Church, and the special occasion which brought the body of men together. The banquet was prepared and served by a committee of ten ladies. In the early part of the feast, Brother Lewis was importuned to sing a solo, and he responded with "Abide with Me." Mrs. Lewis accompanied him on the piano. For an hour following the banquet there was story-telling and brief talks by a number, the formal address of the evening being by M. C. Pearson. Frank E. Beach also spoke at some length, and his remarks were pertinent and most highly appreciated. Of the sixty-eight men who sat at the banquet, there was but one who was a member of New Castle meeting when the present church building was erected, almost thirty years ago. The membership of the meeting is now about four times what it was then.

Traverse City.—Traverse City Quarterly Meeting was held at Manton, Michigan, January 17 and 18. The meeting was favored with the presence of Ancil E. Ratliff, Efficiency Secretary of Indiana Yearly Meeting. His sermons and words of advice and encouragement, and his whole-souled enthusiasm were a great uplift to the Quarterly Meeting. He also attended two sessions of the week of special meetings held at Traverse City, beginning the 18th instant. His services at that place were of much help and strength. He held a meeting for the Quarterly Meeting superintendents of church work, which was very helpful. They entered into an organization to further the work of the various departments of the Church. The Quarterly Meeting greatly appreciated the presence and help of Ancil Ratliff, and trust he may be permitted to be with us again in the near future.

Traverse City local meeting continued the special meetings over another week, with some conversions as a result, and much spiritual growth to the church. Two names were given for membership at the following Monthly Meeting.

IOWA YEARLY MEETING

Le Grande.—We closed a very successful revival meeting at Le Grande on January 28th. Thirty sessions were held, besides a number of cottage prayer meetings. From twenty-five to thirty were definitely blessed. Several are uniting with Friends. Elgie McCargar, of Oskaloosa, was with us throughout the meeting. He preached the gospel in the power of the Spirit and with plainness and simplicity. Aunt Mary Plummer, who is almost ninety-six years of age, attended every evening session, except one.

Earlham.—The Earlham Bible School has just re-organized with H. J. Hadley, Superintendent, Gertrude Walton, Assistant, and the following teachers: Elizabeth Garrett, Wallace Jackson, Mary Compton, Pearl Braner, Silas Thompson, Lillian Mendenhall, E. Howard Brown, Willis Craven, Louisa Maxwell, Jesse Hadley, Samuel Hightower.

The first week in February was Christian Endeavor week at the Earlham meeting. On Sabbath evening, the 1st, E. Howard Brown gave an address on Jamaican Missions, illustrated by stereopticon views. On Monday there was a recruiting social; Tuesday, an address on "Temperance and White Slavery," by Mary Sibbitts, of Wichita, Kansas; Wednesday, prayer meeting; Thursday, a temperance program by the Junior and Senior Societies; Friday, an address by President D. M. Edwards, of Penn College; while Sabbath, the 8th, was Decision Day, led by the pastor, E. Howard Brown.

Oskaloosa.—The Men's Brotherhood of the Oskaloosa Friends' Meeting at their regular meeting on January 20th, entertained the boys of the Bible School and congregation. There were about fifty boys present between the ages of ten to sixteen years, and forty men of the Brotherhood. A bounteous supper was served, to which the boys did full justice. After a short business meeting, a few athletic contests were witnessed, in which the boys took the leading parts. The evening's exercises were closed with a brief season of prayer. This is the second entertainment given the boys by the Brotherhood, and it is the intention to make it an annual affair.

On January 21, 22 and 23, Frank W. Dell held a few meetings in our new meeting house designed particularly for the church members. His messages were along the line of teaching and exposition, and were highly appreciated by all who heard them.

Des Moines.—Mr. and Mrs. Richard R. Newby were "At Home" in the new parsonage of the First Friends' Church, of Des Moines, Iowa, on January 30th to all Friends. Mr. and Mrs. A. B. Elliott, donors of the parsonage, were guests of honor.

Christian Endeavor week was observed by the Friends. The Endeavorers took charge of the Wednesday evening prayer meeting. M. Emma Newby gave a lesson on "Quakerism"; Oliver Comfort, a short talk on Loyalty to the Church. After this, a social time was had.

Bear Creek.—On Sunday, February 1, Mary E. Sibbitt, of Wichita, Kansas, gave two lectures at Bear Creek Church, which were well attended. Her addresses were much appreciated. The collection taken for the Yearly Meeting temperance work was $28.20. In the evening the Christian Endeavor Society took a free-will offering for work on "Purity Lines," amounting to $9.22.

KANSAS YEARLY MEETING

Rose Valley.—Herbert L. Starkey, of Satanta, Kansas, was present at our Monthly Meeting January 3d, and began a series of meetings which closed January 18th. Nineteen were definitely blessed, and there were seven accessions to the Church. The preaching was strong, clear and convincing. The Church was strengthened and blessed, and we feel thankful to our Heavenly Father for calling Brother Starkey this way. He returned home for a few days' rest before engaging in evangelistic work elsewhere.

Fowler.—Fowler Quarterly Meeting is composed of four Monthly Meetings, three of which, Rose Valley, Lone Star and Bethel, are in Stevens County, some sixty miles west of Fowler. Quarterly Meeting is held once at each place during the year. In November, it was held at Rose Valley. We had with us our Yearly Meeting Superintendent, L. Clarkson Hinshaw; he always brings us a message that helps and encourages us to press on in the great work that is before us as a Quarterly Meeting. Melissa Fellows was with us in the interests of Missions. The subject for the doctrinal conference on Friday forenoon was one which other meetings might take up with profit: "Are present-day theories as to the divinity of Jesus Christ destructive to the doctrine of our Church?" The next Quarterly Meeting will be held at Fowler, the third Saturday and Sunday in February. Should any feel a call this way at that time, they will receive a warm welcome. If there are any seeking a home in the west among Friends, come this way and help us make Fowler Quarterly Meeting a success in winning souls for Christ and the Church.

Cherokee, Oklahoma.—News from Cherokee, Oklahoma, is to the effect that the place has been undergoing a great religious awakening. A men's gospel team, assisted by the women who have also organized for effective work, is doing much to bring the town to Christ. The men's team is composed of members of the Friends, Methodist, Christian and Baptist Churches in about equal numbers. After a week of special meetings, in which there were from one to eight conversions, a team from Wichita went there January 18th and held three meetings, with the result that thirty-nine were converted. The following week, the home team conducted meetings with splendid results, and last Sunday, one hundred and two persons confessed Christ. At another meeting last week there were twenty. In all, there have been about two hundred and fifty conversions, and the only outside help has been from the Lord and the Wichita team one day.

Wichita.—Wichita Friends are looking forward with pleasurable anticipation to the coming of A. J. Brown, of Wilmington, who is to do some special work among the students in the University, and also in the Church. The meetings will begin February 8th. Services in the day-time will be devoted entirely to improving the spiritual life of the student body, while the evening services will be for the Church and the surrounding community.

WESTERN YEARLY MEETING

Indianapolis, First Church.—Seven new members, received into membership at the First Friends' Church, Indianapolis, Indiana, at the last monthly meeting business meeting, were given public recognition at the regular morning service, Sunday, February 1st. This service was the last of a two weeks' evangelistic series. The good results of these meetings cannot be estimated. A deeper and fuller purpose pervades the entire congregation.

WILMINGTON YEARLY MEETING

New Assistant.—Owing to the poor health of Josephus Hoskins, superintendent of evangelistic and pastoral work, the evangelistic committee appointed William Starbuck as his associate, and he will bear a good portion of the responsibility until Yearly Meeting time. Much appreciation of the faithful services of Josephus Hoskins was expressed.

Wilmington.—Church attendance day in Wilmington proved a great success. The Friends' Church was filled in the morning and a large congregation in the evening.

Bulletins.—Bulletins concerning the progress and needs of the campaign in Wilmington Yearly Meeting are prepared each week by the Executive Committee's Secretary, Homer Biddlecum, and are read in each meeting on Sunday. This plan is proving very effective in quickening interest.

NEW SECRETARIES FOR THE FEDERAL COUNCIL

The Federal Council of Churches, in developing its forces of secretaries, is following closely the principle of co-ordination for the greatest possible economy. The only secretary whose work is supported from the general funds of the Council is Dr. Charles S. Macfarland, who has been designated to direct the general administration of the Council.

The work of the new Associate Secretary at Washington, D. C., Dr. H. K. Carroll, will be sustained from special funds for the purpose, as is the case with the Commission on the Church and Social Service, the work of its field investigator for country life, Dr. Charles O. Gill, and the work of the Commission on Peace and Arbitration, whose secretary is Dr. Frederick Lynch.

The Secretary of the Commission on Evangelism, W. E. Biederwolf, and the proposed work of the Commission on Temperance, whose newly elected secretary is Prof. Charles Scanlon, of Pittsburgh, will be sustained respectively by special funds to be raised by the evangelistic and temperance agencies of the constituent denominations. The larger part of the secretarial work of the Commission on the Church and Social Service is being done by the denominational social service secretaries who become Associate Secretaries of this Commission.

The Commission on Religious Education has elected Henry H. Meyer as secretary, and he is serving without salary.

The publication of the books will depend upon a sufficient number of subscriptions being secured. Price not to exceed $2.00; the probable price will be $1.50.

THAT CONFERENCE OF MEN

The following are samples of many communications coming to this office concerning the proposed conference of men. We are sorry not to be able to give space for all, but these are representative. Others will appear later.

Denver Meeting.—This Meeting united most heartily in endorsing the call for a conference of the men of our Church to talk over plans for the advancement of the work of Friends in America.

Taken from the minutes of Denver Quarterly Meeting of Friends' Church, held at Denver, Colorado, First month twenty-fourth, nineteen hundred fourteen. CHAS. D. WEEKS, Clerk.

Daisy D. Barr, Muncie, Indiana.—I have been much interested in the articles appearing in the American Friend about a conference of men among us. I am very anxious that such a conference should be held. I see no reason why Friends should not hold such a meeting, when for so many years we held separate sessions of men's and women's meetings. In these days there are so many conferences for betterment held by women only, that I am very glad that such a movement for men Friends is being agitated among us. Various movements in other denominations to awaken the interest of men in the great religious movements of today, have brought a great deal of life and vigor, besides a splendid consecration of finances to the work of Christ. I feel that we, with others, need this new light that will put our money behind our message; sending it forth to make the kingdoms of this earth become the kingdoms of our Lord and His Christ. I hope this conference will be called soon, and I know of no better place to hold it than in the city of Indianapolis.

F. S. Blair, Guilford College, N. C.—I have watched with growing interest the discussions about the Conference of men appearing from week to week in The American Friend. I think women ought at least, to be invited to participate. However, the discussion by women in the American Friend, especially the two articles by Eliza Armstrong Cox and Anna May Pemberton DeCou are pertinent, illuminating and helpful; so that whether women attend and participate in the conference or not, men will be better prepared to act well and wisely in the premises. If the conference convenes, I think it should be in Richmond or Indianapolis, Indiana.

A. Rosenberger, Whittier, California.—The proposed Conference of men meets my hearty approval. The men especially of our Church, need something to bring about a better concert of action. A broader vision of the unparalleled opportunities now opening before us is essential to any real forward movement. The Friends should have better "team work."

Grace E. Gifford, Dartmouth, Mass.—It has been said that the Church must be progressive. Can we call it such, when a conference of Friends is planned, in which women will be totally unrepresented? I believe that Friends, as a religious sect, were the first to openly and publicly admit women to service in the ministry, on exactly the same terms as men. This was eminently right, just and considerate, as behooved the followers of the humble Nazarene. It is evident that God the Father, made no distinction as to sex in the beginning, for "Male and female, created he them, and gave them dominion."

I cannot think of any phase of work, any vital problems to be solved, in which women are not equally as capable as men to direct ways and means of overcoming them. In the work of the Church at large of all denominations, I think that it will be acknowledged that women have borne their full share, physically, mentally, morally, financially and spiritually. Can Friends afford to ignore such a valuable asset? I trust that Friends, who have stood so long and so valiently on the higher level, will not take this backward step.

Charles E. Hiatt, Marion, Indiana.—Just a word about the conference of the men of our Church; by all means, let us get together in such a meeting. We need to get down to 'brass tacks' as men of the Church; and if we do not lay some sane, safe lines of operation, we are bound to fall out of the ranks.

Fred E. Smith, Greensboro, N. C.—I wish to give my approval of a conference of the men of the Church. I see no good reason why it should not be held, and many reasons for the need of it. I feel that it is a matter that should be settled by the men. I feel that the attitude of Eliza Armstrong Cox, as expressed in a recent issue of The American Friend, is in accord with the true Quaker principles, and expresses the convictions of the majority of the Friends.

John W. Dorland, Pasadena, California.—I think your convention for men idea a good one. * * * The thing should be pushed through to a successful issue.

E. J. Harold, Greensboro, N. C.—I have neglected speaking my mind on the question of holding a conference of men Friends until the present; not because I have not favored it, but because I thought it surely would be decided favorably. I hasten to add my word, in the sincere hope that such a conference will be held during 1914. Those of us who are engaged in the great religious and social tasks which reach beyond our own denominational lines, are thoroughly aware of the fact, that as a denomination, we are not measuring up to our precedent or privilege. It is absolute folly for anyone to bring up the question of equality of privilege between the sexes in this connection. At this time in the history of the Five Years Meeting, the need for such a conference and the impetus it will give to plans contemplated, or already undertaken, make such a gathering almost imperative. I do not see how you could improve upon the statement of the big problems before us, viz.: first, a financial plan; second, the co-ordination of our activities; and third, our relationship to other denominations in Christian work. I trust you will not cease the agitation for this conference.

STUDY OF COWPER

Professor W. W. Comfort, of Cornell University, writes to the Westonian (Philadelphia) that he would be grateful for any definite information concerning the study of the poetry of William Cowper in Friends' Schools during the last century. The following queries cover the matter under consideration: (1) When was the study of Cowper introduced into Friends' Schools? (2) In what manner and in what text-books was his poetry read? (3) Did his poetry exercise a profound influence upon Friends' literary taste? (4) When and why was the study of his poetry discontinued?—From The Friend (London).

THE OLDEST PATRON

Elizabeth McCoy, Kingman, Indiana, was one hundred and two years old on August 15th last. She is perhaps the oldest patron we have upon The American Friend list. She sends word that this is the only paper in which she is personally interested, and enjoys it very much.

A CORRECTION

In The American Friend of January 22, on page 58, the name of Anna May Pemberton should be Anna May Pemberton DeCou.

CAMPAIGN FOR 1,000 MEMBERS

Wilmington Yearly Meeting is pressing a campaign vigorously for one thousand new members. The following statement has been issued concerning it:

A concern was felt in the Yearly Meeting on Ministry and Oversight, this past year, that Wilmington Yearly Meeting ought to accomplish greater things for the Master. The concern spread rapidly; and, referred to a committee, took the form that we should, under God's blessing, add to our membership the coming year one thousand members. The concern was officially laid before the Yearly Meeting at large, was there enthusiastically approved, and a committee was appointed to formulate plans for conducting this campaign for 1,000 new members.

In pursuance of the object of their appointment, this special committee called a conference of the Friends of Center, Fairfield and Miami Quarterly Meetings to be held at Wilmington, November 28, 1913. This conference, attended by representatives from twenty-six particular meetings, entered heartily into a discussion of ways and means of accomplishing our great work. Homer G. Biddlecum addressed the meeting upon the subject, "The Necessity of a Union of our Forces;" Edgar Stinson spoke pointedly upon "What Course shall we Pursue in this Campaign?" and Clayton Terrell presented forcibly the topic, "The Need of Enthusiasm in our Work."

An enthusiastic round table discussion, conducted by Albert J. Brown, resulted in the adoption of the following resolutions, viz.:

1. There shall be an executive committee of three, who shall devote all of their time necessary to the direction and prosecution of the campaign.

2. There shall be a special correspondence committee of one or more members in each particular meeting, whose duty it shall be to form a prompt medium of communication between the local meeting and the executive committee.

3. The financial responsibility for this special campaign shall rest upon the special committee appointed by the Yearly Meeting.

4. Each particular meeting is requested to hold parlor meetings to discuss informally the local campaign.

5. The executive committee of three shall select a corresponding secretary to have charge of the correspondence of the executive committee.

6. A reserve committee of workers shall be organized in certain localities, ready to go at any call to assist in a local campaign.

7. There shall also be formed in certain communities a reserve force of singers, to be volunteers for service in special meetings. Volunteers shall also be sought to go to needy meetings to lead the singing during special services.

8. Gospel teams from Wilmington College shall go out to hold week-end and holiday meetings. President Samuel H. Hodgkin reported that the Y. M. C. A. and the Y. W. C. A., of the College, were very willing to furnish such gospel teams.

9. Speakers shall go out from this conference to present the campaign to other meetings assembled to consider it.

10. On the second Sabbath in December the campaign and its plans shall be presented to each particular meeting, and an offering for the prosecution of the campaign shall be taken up.

The conference elected the following as the Executive Committee: Josephus Hoskins, Amos Cook and Albert J. Brown. This committee then selected Homer G. Biddlecum, Cuba, Ohio, as its corresponding secretary.

AMOS COOK,

Chairman of Conference.

HOMER G. BIDDLECUM,

Secretary.

LUCY A. WINNEY

Lucy A. Winney died October 25, 1913, aged seventy-five years. There is not much known of her early life. She was born in Ohio, and received her education there. She came west in her early womanhood with the tribe, the Wyandotts, when they came west to Wyandott, Kansas. She then came to Indian Territory when the tribe removed, and settled on Grand River, near the town of Wyandott, named after their old home in Kansas. She was a well informed woman, and even before she was converted, held a great influence among her people. At about the age of thirty years she married John A. Winney, Chief of the Seneca Indians.

She opened her home to hold the first religious meeting ever held in the Seneca tribe by Jeremiah Hubbard, the missionary among the Indians at that time. Although she was not then converted, she realized what a great blessing the gospel of Christ would have on her people. She was among the first to give her heart to God, and soon after, her husband also was converted, and they both lived a consecrated life until called to the heavenly home. She was an Elder and Clerk of the Monthly Meeting for several years, until her failing health made the care too great a burden. She was a sweet singer, and her voice was often heard in praise and prayer. She often said she was ready to go when the Master called for her. She was a kind neighbor, and her genial hospitality made her home a pleasant place to go. Interment was made in the Seneca burying ground near the Church she loved so well. Funeral services were conducted by Harry Wallace, the missionary in charge.

BIBLE SCHOOL LESSON

February 22.

Subject.—Faith Destroying Fear.Lesson.—Luke 12: 1-12.Golden Text.—Everyone who shall confess me before men, him shall the Son of Man confess before the angels of God.—Luke 12: 8.Time.—January A.D. 30. Soon after the last lesson.Place.—In Perea.

The lesson follows closely the teaching of the last lesson, and is a protest against insincerity no less than open disobedience.

*Many thousands * * * gathered.* Jesus' mission in Perea was bearing fruit. The multitudes were stirred with conflicting opinions, and increasingly He manifested His ability to draw the populace within the circle of His influence.

Nothing covered up that shall not be revealed. Phariseism would be exposed in the white light of truth. The wolf in sheep's clothing is none the less a wolf, and in spite of the exterior, the wolf within is bound to be revealed. Hypocrisy cannot forever wear a mask. No less true is it that innate goodness cannot be suppressed. It is sure to find a voice that will reach deaf ears and penetrate dull understandings.

Fear him. Despite the shams and hypocrisy; despite all efforts to conceal wrong and immorality, there is One who will bring the secrets to the open light of day—One who has power not only over that which is here and now, but over the eternal destiny of man. Fear not man, whose power reaches not beyond the grave, whose reign is only temporal. Fear Him rather who holdeth the world in His hands; who is to be King for ever and ever.

Fear not. He who cares for the sparrows will care for his children. By fearing God, we learn to be unafraid of our own welfare and destiny.

Shall confess me. Allegiance to Christ is the only sure guarantee of blessing. Confess me and I will acknowledge you; not as in a trade or a bargain, but as indicating the deepest fellowship between the human and Divine.

Blasphemeth against the Holy Ghost. Conscious and deliberate rejection of the Spirit of God; an absolute refusal to acknowledge subjection to Divine leadership cannot be forgiven. Overt acts of sin repented of can be forgiven, but continued, persistent, malicious, wilful and final rejection of the Holy Ghost as the comforter and guide, gives no chance to the Father to extend the beneficence of His forgiving power. Such disobedience is blasphemy; is treason against God.

Shall teach you. The test of man's fealty as subjects of the new kingdom is his willingness to be taught the way of life; his willingness to follow whithersoever the Holy Spirit may lead.

CENTRAL ACADEMY

On the evening of February 3, a most interesting social event occurred at Central Academy, Plainfield, Indiana. The early evening was devoted to listening to a splendid program which was largely furnished by members of the alumni, except the address, which was forcefully delivered by Professor Simon Hester, Principal of the Academy. His subject was "Twentieth Century Culture from the Standpoint of a Guarded Christian Education." He discussed this theme, using denominational schools as the possible factor. The state provides training for the intellect and body, but does not provide for soul development. An excellent display of work done in the Domestic Science department, which, by the way, is one of fine equipment, was much enjoyed. One feature of this display was three plates of confectionary which were sold. Three gentlemen made themselves heads of companies which were chosen as we used to chose for spelling matches. The members of each company put their cash offerings together and their leaders then proceeded to bid for the candy, which was sold by an autioneer, who was coaxed away from a busy legal profession long enough to sell the candy. The sale amounted to an abundance of merriment for the audience and $10.50 for the Domestic Science department. Central Academy is recognized as a great force for promoting good education and Church loyalty.

SETH STAFFORD

Seth Stafford, son of Eli and Elizabeth Pritchard Stafford, was born five miles west of Newcastle, in Greensboro township, November 5, 1830, and entered into rest at his home near the place of his birth, December 22, 1913, aged eighty-three years 1 month and 17 days.

Early in life a strong passion for learning possessed him. After he had exhausted all the resources country life afforded him, he pursued his studies at Antioch College, and for thirty years was a teacher in the common schools, and was a faithful, enthusiastic instructor.

On March 8, 1860, he was united in marriage to Rebecca Jane Albertson. To them were given four children. These, together with nine grandchildren, compose his immediate family, in whose welfare and education he was ever deeply interested. The same spirit of determination which he showed in acquiring an education, was shown in every enterprise in life. Whatever he decided to be right and profitable, he pushed

THE WAY OUT

From Weakness to Power by Food Route

Getting the right start for the day's work often means the difference between doing things in wholesome comfort, or dragging along half dead all day.

There's more in the use of proper food than many people ever dream of—more's the pity.

"Three years ago I began working in a general store," writes a man, "and between frequent deliveries and more frequent customers, I was kept on my feet from morning till night.

"Indigestion had troubled me for some time, and in fact, my slight breakfast was taken more from habit than appetite. At first this insufficient diet was not noticed much, but at work it made me weak and hungry long before noon.

"Yet a breakfast of rolls, fried foods and coffee meant headache, nausea and kindred discomforts. Either way I was losing weight and strength, when one day a friend suggested that I try a 'Grape-Nuts breakfast.'

"So I began with some stewed fruit, Grape-Nuts and cream, a soft boiled egg, toast, and a cup of Postum. By noon I was hungry, but with a healthy, normal appetite. The weak, languid feeling was not there.

"My head was clearer, nerves steadier than for months. Today my stomach is strong, my appetite normal, my bodily power splendid and head always clear."

every effort to accomplish, and was a successful farmer and stock raiser.

A birthright member of the Society of Friends and converted when a young man, he remained interested in its growth and activities throughout his life. In the years of his manhood he was continuously in a position of responsibility in the church. In the year 1878, he was acknowledged as a minister and since then has devoted part of his time preaching for his home congregation, and as an evangelist in company with others. He, with his wife, were faithful attenders of the Clear Spring Sabbath School from the time it was established, and have given liberally of their time, talents and means to all church and missionary work.

He attended services regularly so long as health permitted, from the Yearly Meeting at Richmond, to the various meetings of the home church. In 1910 many friends were present at the celebration of their fiftieth wedding anniversary, the home ever being a hospitable one, blest by daily Bible reading and prayer.

During the months of his declining health, the faithful, affectionate care of his wife was a great comfort to him; the visits of his children and the kindness of many friends much appreciated.

WESTTOWN, PENNSYLVANIA

WESTTOWN SCHOOL is conducted by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Friends and is attended by the children of about twelve Yearly Meetings. It and successfully prepares for College some twenty pupils a year.

HAS ALL THE ATTRIBUTES OF AN

Because of its nearness to Philadelphia it is surrounded by a large group of devoted friends who are continually helping the School, and bringing to it their religious concerns, and their interest in the

"How Beautiful to Be with God"

BY NETTIE BACON CHRISTIAN

(Last words of Miss Frances Willard)

How beautiful to be with God!
Beautiful, beautiful!
To see the Father's glorious face
In all its majesty and grace;
To stand within that holy place;
Beautiful, how beautiful!

How beautiful to be with God!
Beautiful, beautiful!
To hear the voice of Christ, the Son:
"Ye blessed of the Lord, well done!"
Enter my rest and share my throne."
Beautiful, how beautiful!

How beautiful to be with God!
Beautiful, beautiful!
To lay aside this toil-worn dress,
And robes of purest white possess,
And wear a crown of righteousness;
Beautiful, how beautiful!

How beautiful to be with God!
Beautiful, beautiful!
To drop this tenement of clay,
And soar to realms of perfect day,
Where all our tears are wiped away;
Beautiful, how beautiful!

How beautiful to be with God!
Beautiful, beautiful!
To join that great unnumbered throng
Who praise the Lamb with harp and tongue,
And sing the sweet redemption song;
Beautiful, how beautiful!

"American Friend Day"

Several of our readers are writing to say that their local meetings will observe "AMERICAN FRIEND Day" on March 1, as suggested. This is encouraging and should be an example to others.

Is there any satisfactory reason why this date should not be observed by every meeting, especially in the Yearly Meetings composing the Five Years Meeting? The management wants both the prayers and friendly sympathy and co-operation of all Friends in America. Why may not its mission to the Society of Friends be the subject both of prayer and sympathetic consideration on the same day in all our meetings. And why as a logical conclusion of this consideration may not an earnest effort be made to secure as large a list as possible of new subscribers to this official periodical of the Church?

THE AMERICAN FRIEND must have at least 2,000 more subscribers before it will be on a paying basis. If every meeting will press this matter properly and in the right spirit, the bulk of this number can be secured on March 1, at the special price of One Dollar for the remainder of the year. If names are sent in promptly, it will mean practically ten months for $1.00 a year. This means 688 pages, or 13,072 inches (two columns to the page) of valuable reading matter. It is not many books of 688 pages that can be bought for $1.00.

But every member needs THE AMERICAN FRIEND, and that is the most important element in the problem. No one can keep in touch with the work of the whole Church without the paper.

We cannot impress the importance of this matter too strongly. We believe that the whole Church ought to feel the responsibility of helping to put the paper upon a paying basis, so that it may be of the highest possible service to the whole membership and brotherhood of meetings. Do not let the day go by thoughtlessly. The time has come to lay the matter of our periodical heavily upon the heart of every family. If in any meeting other arrangements make another day necessary, we would suggest that March 8th be observed in that meeting. Special offer of $1.00 to new subscribers for the balance of the year 1914. Let every meeting send in some names. Who will send in the largest list?

Is a Religious Upheaval Imminent?

Last week we referred to questions being put by the Philadelphia North American to prominent men, asking whether in their judgment a religious revival is impending, and if so, what will be its form or manifestation. We published in connection therewith brief replies from three well-known men. We reproduce below later replies by Rufus M. Jones and Joseph Elkinton, well known to Friends:

BY RUFUS M. JONES

It is my conviction that a profound revival of religion has already come. Mr. Moody once made the pregnant remark, when discussing revivals, that "God never repeats himself." Each great revival of religion in the past has been unique, and we may well expect the revival in our time to follow fresh, new lines of expression. The difficulty is that those who are praying for a revival often fail to recognize it when it comes, because they are looking for a repetition of some earlier type of revival.

The revival which I see now going on in the Christian world has two striking characteristics:

(1) There is, to those who have eyes to see it, a deep and earnest seeking, on the part of serious men and women, for inward first-hand experience of God, for a religion which verifies itself in the human soul. This awakening of mystical religion means a mighty increase of spiritual power in the near future.

(2) There is also under way a still more widespread awakening of interest in the practical application of the gospel of Christ to the needs of humanity and to the corporate life of the world.

Social service is no empty work—it is an attempt to take the gospel seriously and to put it into living operation, to make it a dynamic fact. This movement, like the mystical awakening, is only just in the early burst of its coming, but it will go far before its work is done. What we most need now are prophets who can be living voices and personal embodiments of these new revelations of God's present spirit in the world today.

BY JOSEPH ELKINTON

After a careful study of world conditions during the past decade, I unhesitatingly say there never was a day since Jesus Christ said to His disciples, "Behold, the kingdom of God is in your midst," when that kingdom was more imminent.

The late Student Volunteer Conference at Kansas City, with its 5,000 delegates—representing 800 schools, colleges and universities—is evidence enough of that, because of its high-born enthusiasm and deep spiritual purpose to extend that kingdom to the ends of the earth. It was a close second to the great World's

The Church Must Be Missionary

The most tremendous fact about this twentieth century is the prevalence of the missionary spirit throughout all Christendom. We do not refer to missions in that circumscribed sense, which concerns alone the preaching of the gospel in the uncivilized regions of earth. That is only one phase—albeit a vital one—of that great missionary program which the Son of God came to earth to inaugurate, and which includes the whole scope of gospel activities as applied to human needs everywhere. Our interest is in the world-wide mission of the Church to make Jesus Christ known to all the world in saving and keeping power, in temporal relief and help, in transforming energy as applied to individual uplift and the renovation of the social order.

Home and foreign missions are essentially one. Both are the visible resultants of the same solicitude and anxiety of soul which every Christian life ought to have for a world that is groping in darkness and sin. In the broad and vital sense, the missionary task is inclusive of the whole gospel plan for world redemption. Whether this task concerns the threatened infidelity of Japan, the revival of Confucianism as the State religion of China, the dogmatic exclusiveness of the Greek religion in Russia, the persistence of the caste spirit in India, the intolerance of Romanism in South America, the awful blindness of heathenism in Africa, the inhumanity of our own city slums and tenement districts, the degradation of the devotees of vice and the saloon, the wretchedness of poverty, the contamination of the social order, the oppressions of child labor or the negligence and indifference of the masses, it is a task to which the Church must apply itself with travail of soul and with well directed energy if the Divine Commission is to be obeyed. Not only does every soul have an inalienable right to know the truth as revealed in Jesus Christ by the power of the Spirit, but upon the Church rests the inescapable responsibility of carrying on the work begun in Judea and Samaria and Gallilee, until every nation and every people shall have heard the glad news of a gospel that can transform this old earth and make the desert to bloom and blossom as the rose.

In the face of this comprehensive task, there is a danger that the Church will be tempted to shift the burden of its responsibility somewhat. The high notes of the missionary appeal in recent years have been voiced by the Edinburg conference, the Laymen's Missionary Movement and Student Volunteers, all of which, while having the sympathy and prayers and co-operation of the Church, are not essentially a part of the Church's organism. This is not said to the discredit of these great and tremendously powerful movements, but the Church needs zealously to guard against the possibility of shifting the emphasis of its own appeal, which should ever spring organically from the heart of the Church, to any other movement, however efficient it may be. The missionary spirit, which after all is a religious passion for humanity, must forever be the essential characteristic of the life and work of the Church, or else the Church will lose its inheritance and fail ingloriously at the most vital point of its mission.

It will be increasingly easy for the Church to lean hard upon such movements as the Laymen's Missionary Association and the Student Volunteers, and in consequence the temptation will be increasingly felt for these to become formulated organizations for the purpose of perpetuating the work which the Church is inclining gradually to relinquish. We repeat that this is not said in disparagement of these or any other splendid organizations. Our concern is that the emphasis of missionary zeal shall be kept in the proper quarter. These and all other movements must remain as aids to the Church, and the Church must never occupy a secondary place in its purpose and effort to spread the Kingdom of God in the earth. The Church must be missionary in spirit, in purpose, in action, consumed with a holy zeal to carry the light of the gospel into every dark corner of earth, or it will cease to be a Church.

Increasingly the problem of missionary support will be a perplexing one. As the wholeness of the gospel task is revealed to the mind of the Church and its magnitude looms large above the horizon of its vision, there will be a growing tendency to shrink from the responsibilities which this task imposes. In about eight years, the Christian world has doubled its contributions to foreign missions. Probably the increase for home missions has been in less proportion. The Church is hardly keeping pace in numbers and in its benevolences with its opportunities. But who will dare say that the capabilities of the Church financially have yet been tested? Can it be said especially of Friends?

The United Missionary campaign which has taken a deep hold upon certain denominations and which was intended for all is now approaching its climax. It is a movement organized for the express purpose of meeting the financial needs of the Church at an opportune time. The preliminary work has practically all been done, and in March it is expected that throughout our American Protestant Churches the local congregations will carry on the "every-member" canvass, designed to pledge every member, whether young or old, to give something to the work of the Church and to give it regularly, indicating how much for current expenses and how much for the various benevolences.

It is earnestly hoped by the Executive Committee of the Five Years Meeting that Friends meetings generally are making preparations to avail themselves of this golden opportunity. Probably most of the financial troubles which Friends have arise from the lax and uncertain methods which have prevailed, and from the fact that so many members are not contributing in any regular satisfactory way to the work of the local meeting and the benevolences of the Church. The every-member canvass commends itself, and experience elsewhere reveals its potentiality.

God is calling the Church into a larger field of service—into a higher realm of living. The cry of the age is for a wider vision. The spirit of the century is assuredly religious. The passion for service has proved a real tonic to the sluggish energies of the Church. The heroism of modern times is shown upon the mission fields of the world. "The morning light is breaking." Will the Church keep abreast of its opportunity? That is the vital problem of this age. The completest and most positive demonstration of the Divine favor will wait upon the solution of this problem.

The United Missionary Campaign

The United Missionary Campaign is rapidly approaching its climax. For a year, under the direction of the Layman's Missionary movement, the churches of the various Protestant denominations in America have been going through a system of preparation—that is, those which have been willing to co-operate—for a general "every-member" canvass in March, designed to lay the burden of Church support more generally and more equitably upon the whole membership.

We do not know how universally Friends' meetings have laid the foundation for this canvass. To fail to participate in this simultaneous effort is to miss a golden opportunity. We learn of one meeting that has already made the canvass with surprising beneficial results. Aside from the financial benefit, both for the local meeting and all the benevolences, the personal touch of such a canvass with all the membership will be no insignificant asset in this project.

We present herewith a few editorial utterances from other papers upon this vital subject:

The Continent (Presbyterian)

"HOW MUCH WILL YOU GIVE FOR CHURCH BENEVOLENCES THIS YEAR?"

You are due to hear that question right soon now, if you belong to church at all. What church makes little difference; the question will get around to you just the same, for practically all the Protestant denominations (except the Episcopalians) are in the compact among the churches for an "every-member canvass" not later than March.

The idea of this enterprise—"United Missionary Campaign," it is called—is to reach every individual Protestant in this country with a direct personal challenge not only to give something to Christian missions and other benevolences, but to say beforehand just how much the gift shall be—to give in regular stated installments, moreover, and not according to uncertain spasms of impulse.

And you ought to approve the churches in this, especially if you have ever joined in the almost universal lamentation that the churches are not businesslike. This is businesslike; indeed, it's business itself. It is finding out what there is to spend before it's spent—measuring the size of the cloth before the coat is cut.

It is besides, of course, a plan to get more cloth for a bigger coat, but that, too, is businesslike. It wouldn't be much of a business which wasn't trying for expansion. * * *

When the church adopts a budget for benevolences, the church member ought to adopt a personal budget for his benevolences. The systematic church is entitled to the support of systematic members.

"What ought I to give?" is the fair and right question for the member to ask himself in the face of the church's every-member canvass. And that question does not correspond to either "How much are they going to hold me up for?" or "How little can I get off with?"

Instead, the "ought" demands some principle of giving—some rule which shall ground this duty on a permanent foundation.

Fortunately, there is such a rule and measure furnished in the Bible, and it is a measure attested not only by Scripture but by the happy use of a hundred generations of men and women who have wished to be honest with God and have been blessed in that honesty.

That rule is to give a tenth of one's income to God's work.

The United Presbyterian

This issue of our paper will remind our readers that the time for the every-member canvass is just at hand. It is hardly necessary for us to speak of the vital importance of this work; we have come to recognize its fundamental character. Our Church cannot afford to go back upon her record. She has been setting the pace for the other Churches in the matter of financing the work of the kingdom of God, and it is our hope that she will improve upon her own record.

The success of the every-member canvass depends very largely upon the enthusiasm and initiative of the pastors. It is recognized, of course, that congregational finances belong, in large measure, to the laymen. Nevertheless, the pastor must lead. He is ordained to leadership, not only in the strictly spiritual things, but, as well, in the matters of ecclesiastical organization and of finance. Experience has shown that just in proportion as the pastor takes up this work and pushes it with energy and enthusiasm, the canvass in that particular congregation proves a great success.

We trust that the pastors will give very careful attention to the literature which is being sent out by the Missionary and Efficiency Committee. Let every paragraph of it be carefully noted. Let all the instructions be strictly followed. The suggestions that are just sent out have been dictated by the experience of the past. We are convinced that pastors will find that they mark the safest and wisest course. We trust that there will be an enthusiastic prosecution of the canvass at the first of this coming month. Cannot the record of the United Presbyterian Church be pushed up to the million mark this year? It will be easily accomplished if all will take hold and pray as they work and work as they pray.

Friends Missionary Advocate

Initial steps have been taken during the year for a United Missionary Campaign on behalf of both home and foreign missions, which shall be nation-wide in its scope, and marked by energetic and united efforts to reach the Christian public with a full-toned and vigorous appeal for missions as presenting at the present hour a providential opportunity to the church of extraordinary impressiveness and unexampled promise. The campaign is already under way, and will culminate in March, 1914, in an every-member canvass throughout the churches of the nation. Will our churches realize that they are face to face with a situation in the non-Christian world which is more significant and far-reaching in its possibilities than even the great historic crisis when Christianity conquered the Roman Empire? It is hardly too much to say that a thoroughly consecrated and faithful church, giving itself to prayer, at this hour may advance with giant strides toward a millennial age of world-wide victory.

Presbyterian Manual

We copy the following from the Manual of the Presbyterian Church on the question of the "every-member" canvass, which may be an inspiration to many of our Friends meetings:

More than forty Protestant bodies, having over twenty million members, join in an interdenominational United Missionary Campaign to establish the plan. The immediate purpose is to secure more adequate support both for the work of each local Church and for the work done by each of the Assembly's Boards. Of even greater importance, however, is the spiritual blessing which will come to Churches and members in larger measure as they give more whole-hearted and loyal obedience to the missionary commands of Christ and the Scriptural teaching as to the methods and measure of giving.

The plan calls for:

A subscription from every member and adherent,
On the weekly basis,
For all local expenses as well as for benevolences,
To be renewed annually,
To be paid by envelope (weekly so far as possible),
A part of public worship,
Providing for all Boards equitably,
To be distributed as the subscriber may indicate,
Undesignated funds to be distributed by the Session.

Most people will give much more, if asked personally. Those who are overlooked feel that their contributions are not fully appreciated. An every-member personal visitation will, on an average, more than double the advance made by any other method.

A complete list of members and adherents should be carefully prepared in advance; preferably in duplicate, on cards, by families. One card, to be carried by the canvasser, should contain the names of all children and members of the household, with other helpful information. The other card remains at headquarters, with note of the canvassers who will see the family. As soon as pledges are secured, the canvassers return the card with such added information as will make it more valuable, to be preserved with its duplicate for next year's canvass.

Send canvassers out by twos. This is most important. It is the Scriptural method; it is easier for the canvassers; it helps to impress the importance of the matter upon those canvassed; permits an elder to go with a trustee, and the inexperienced worker with the experienced.

This is a spiritual campaign. The preparation and the whole canvass must be permeated with prayer. The Sabbath is the best day for the canvass. The morning service should be devoted to the subject (see Manual for Pastors and Officers), and at its close the canvassers should be called forward and dedicated to their work with prayer. The congregation is charged to pray for and co-operate with them.

Most canvasses can be completed within a few days, if not in a single day. The more expeditious the canvass, the more effective it is. A definite time should be fixed in advance within which the report to the congregation is to be made, and each captain should be expected to finish within the time. Reports of progress, made at each Church service, will encourage members and canvassers.

Avoid arguments; but be prepared to give information and to answer questions as to the work of the Boards, the every-member plan and its workings, etc. Distinguish between sincere and insincere objections. Avoid antagonizing anyone. Keep sweet and ninety-nine per cent of the persons canvassed will do the same.

Take care that current expense subscriptions are not reduced in order to increase those for benevolences. This may cause a deficit, create prejudice, and thus hinder the plan. Ask an increase for current expense, if needed, especially if the giver has not been doing his full share.

Make your visit helpful in every way. It is an opportunity to give new inspiration and enthusiasm to those who have grown cold. Seek to interest them again in religion. Urge them to attend regularly. A score of family altars were set up in one Church as the result of tactful work by canvassers.

Doing Our Best with the Bible School

BY WALTER W. HAVILAND

3. After the pupils and the teachers comes the Teaching. The Bible School is an educational institution, but its evangelistic aim must not be forgotten. If the intellectual element is overemphasized, there is danger of spiritual barrenness; if the intellectual element is not emphasized enough, the danger is, mawkish emotionalism, equally barren. "Walking warehouses of Biblical information" are not worth much unless that information fruits in life and character. As Dr. Cope says, "It is not Biblical learning that we desire as an end, but it is the Biblical type of life." The teaching must all focus on character. The materials of teaching must be suited to the needs of the pupils. We must study them and find out what parts of the Bible will be most helpful to them at the different periods of their lives. It is certain that intensive study of the same dozen verses of Scripture is not suited equally well fifty-two times in the year to all the pupils in a Bible School, whether four or eighty-four years of age. There is Biblical material suited to all ages and all conditions; but the same material is not suited to everybody at the same time. The stories of Genesis and the arguments of St. Paul's epistles are not equally well adapted to little children; neither are they of equal value to grown men.

Nearly all thoughtful people, who are not committed to the policy of doing things exactly as their fathers have done, are coming to believe in lessons graded and adapted to the ages and needs of those who use them. This means the banishment of the old uniform lesson, upon which much inspiring and helpful teaching has been based. It does not mean that grading is a panacea for all the ailments of Bible Schools. It is simply a recognition of existing facts, and takes them into account in deciding what shall be the methods of Bible School. It means an adjustment to the development of the child through all his life processes and crises, progressing as the child grows, without breaking and moving steadily to definite ends. The graded system is not a fad; it is the acceptance of principles and ideals of education. Various helpful courses of study in accordance with these principles and ideals have been worked out. They need the personal touch and interest of the teacher to adapt them to the lines of boys and girls, men and women.

This is the vital issue in all Bible School teaching: Does it connect the teachings of the Bible with life? Our task is to make people see that the experiences and deeds of the men and women of the Bible were meant to kindle like experiences and deeds in us. The religion that we have taught our children in times past has been too individualistic, too limited to the welfare of the one who professes it and whose soul it is supposed to save. We are coming to see that the religion of the Bible is the religion of social service. The messages of the prophets, the vitals of the Old Testament, set forth justice and kindness in the relations of life as the supreme concern of Jehovah. The spirit and teachings are at the same time concerned with individual and social life. The man himself is sanctified, brought up to his best, that society may be sanctified, brought up to its best. Love, the fundamental virtue of the Christian life, cannot express itself any other way than socially.

Children had better not be taught that if their hearts are right, their conduct will take care of itself. As Professor Coe says, "The only heart that is right is the one that actively desires and labors for the social ends of the family of God." Principles of concrete goodness must be taught the child and not simply "atmospheric benevolence." Opportunities should be given the children to learn by doing. Not only their interest, but their service should be enlisted in some form of social effort. Some kind of actual mission work should go with mission study. Studies of different occupations and all sorts of social problems should be accompanied by efforts to better conditions close at hand. There are sick to visit and poor to help almost everywhere. There are a few neighborhoods where there are no wrongs to be righted. Teach that "not the virtues you admire, but those for which you perspire are yours." Undigested Bible lessons, like undigested sermons, result in spiritual dyspepsia. Before passing to another theme, I feel like calling attention to the "principles of Division," as properly applicable to more than one phase of Bible School work. Not only should the "word of truth" be "rightly divided," but oftentimes there is a right division of classes, which results in multiplication. Experience has shown the value of the courageous division of a very small class on the basis of a prospect of increased helpfulness to the parts.

Less than two weeks ago, I asked my day-school Scripture Class, numbering 23 boys and girls, between 17 and 20 years of age, high-school Seniors, to write for me frankly their answers to a few questions about Sunday Schools, based upon their own experiences. These young people represented 8 or 10 denominations, and twice as many individual churches and Sunday Schools. From their answers to the first question on the paper it appeared that most of them had attended schools all their lives, and all but one had had some experience in Sunday Schools.

I want to devote the rest of my talk tonight to a report what these young people said, with but little comment. What they said is specially important, since the "teen" age which they represent is one of the great problems of the Bible School today. To make our schools and classes fit the needs and suit the whims of boys and girls just entering manhood and womanhood, challenges the best that is in us. If we succeed in pleasing them, perhaps we should not worry about anything else.

The second question in my set called for an enumeration of the advantages gained from Sunday School in their experience. Of course, the majority mentioned knowledge of the Bible, but nearly as many spoke of the social value of the institution; other advantages mentioned were: Having high ideals presented; being broadened by contact with others and their thoughts; opportunity to discuss moral and social issues of the day; teaching children to be reverent and to worship; reaching parents through children; best opportunity to convert children and attach them for life to the church; knowledge of the doctrine of the church.

All these are real advantages. I think there is a large field in our Bible Schools for the point last mentioned, training in the special teachings of the Society of Friends. Very few Friends' children have ever had any systematic training in what we believe as a denominational existence; why should we not make an effort systematically to transmit our heritage?

The answers to the third question, which invited criticisms of the Sunday School, reflect divergent points of view and indicate varieties of schools. One of the young people—of course, it was a girl—said that criticism, except from a helpful standpoint, should be avoided. Another said that "things to criticize usually came from lack of funds or some equally unavoidable reason."

1. Not enough social life.
2. Too much a social gathering.
3. Too little attention paid to having congenial people, such as girls of an age, in classes together.
4. People talk too much about other things.
5. So much going on all at once, one hardly knows what is being done.
6. Too much singing, calling rolls, etc.
7. Session too long; lessons too dry, tedious and long drawn out.
8. Very few Sunday Schools get down to work.
9. Tendency of the modern Sunday School to make one work hard at writing or discussion not suited to needs of tired people on Sabbath.
10. Lack of go and enthusiasm in leaders.
11. General exercises not of value to all ages; either beyond little ones or so simple as not to hold attention of older ones.

12. Pupils as a whole not interested in Bible reading of Superintendent and singing.

13. Ignorant teachers. Selection of teachers is not given enough thought. Teachers ought to pass an examination before they have a class.

14. Tendency to let teachers do all the work and pupils just listen to what she has learned.

15. Do not dig down deep in life.

16. Lessons should be brought down to daily life.

All of these points may be objects of just criticism in some schools. It is for us to be alert to see in which respects our own schools are guilty and to act accordingly.

A Monthly Meeting Chronicle

BY JUNIUS JUNIOR

VI.

All hail the power of Jesus' name!
Let angels prostrate fall;
Bring forth the royal diadem,
And crown Him Lord of all.

This was the hymn that broke the stillness of the June session of Slow Valley Meeting, and the members, led by the young teacher, sang it with an unction that was uplifting. For fifty minutes the spirit of devotion brooded over the hearts of the assembled company, and so far as could be observed every heart was feeling the touch of a new inspiration. Following a brief but vigorous message by the pastor, the resident minister gave one of those soul-stirring talks that was as new as it was inspiring to Slow Valley Meeting. He at least had caught a vision of a new day for the congregation and for the community, and his soul yearned for the time when Friends at Newtown would measure up to their privileges as well as to their responsibilities in the gospel.

The report of the delegates revealed the fact that the Quarterly Meeting had been unusually profitable and that its devotions and deliberations had been characterized by the conscious presence of the Holy Spirit. Other business matters were quickly disposed of, and the interest grew intense as the business man arose to read the third and last installment of the report of the special committee on the state of the Church.

In brief he cited the fact that previous reports had concerned internal conditions in the meeting, but today the burden was upon the relationship of the congregation to the town and surrounding community. Except in the most general way, the meeting as a meeting had no apparent concern for the neighborhood. Questions of charity, of mission work among the foreigners, of the welfare of the children upon the street, of the religious life of the men in the factories, of the condition of the working girls, of the poor mothers who needed training in the care of the household, of the liquor traffic, of law enforcement, of Sabbath observance, of honest citizenship and kindred subjects, had had little place in the deliberations of the meeting, and when mentioned they had been too readily brushed aside with the explanation that financial conditions would not warrant the attempt to do any outside work.

The report deplored the apparent lack of fellowship and co-ordinated work between the five Churches of the city, and expressed the hope that the spirit of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America might be incorporated into the Christian life of Newtown and vicinity. It was recommended that another committee be named to give special attention to the relationship of the meeting to the community, and if possible to suggest ways and means by which the congregation might have a larger place in promoting the religious life and the general welfare of the people all about them.

The report closed with an earnest exhortation to all the members that they seek to know the mind of the Spirit, and that as a meeting they do not shirk from any responsibility of life and service which might be revealed to them, as with an open mind they considered the problems with which they were being brought face to face.

After a half hour's discussion the meeting approved the suggestion of a committee, apparently with some misgivings. A new spirit was rapidly taking possession of the meeting, impelling it to new endeavor in spite of considerable apparent unwillingness. The new committee was headed by our business friend, the merchant and became known as committee No. 3.

Committee No. 1 said that the problems of the internal conditions of the meeting were so intricate that there had not been sufficient time to formulate anything definite; that while it was felt some progress had been made, the committee would have to ask for further time. This was granted without objection.

Committee No. 2 had a report which was presented by the chairman, the young school teacher. It was listened to with breathless interest, and outlined the manner in which the committee had set about the task of finding out why so large a part of the membership did not attend meeting. It was found that there were nineteen families and parts of families and twelve additional single members who had not attended Friends services the past year. Of these, eleven families and six of the single members had been visited. The causes for non-attendance were interesting and varied. With the majority it was an apparent case of indifference and neglect. They had gradually fallen into the habit of staying at home, and some of them were frank enough to say that the services had not been particularly interesting, and a feeling had gradually developed that it made little difference to the meeting whether they came or not.

One family had had a difference with another in a business transaction, and would not go to a meeting in which the other held such prominence. Two young men and a young woman felt that there was little in the meeting that appealed to them, while two families excused themselves on the ground that they were unable to clothe their children in a way which they felt was demanded at the Bible School.

The work of the committee had borne fruit, however, as two families visited had been present the last two Sabbaths and it was felt that four or five others would soon decide to come, if they could be made to feel that their presence was really desired. The committee made three recommendations:

1. That the members be urged to live close to God, so that not only by their daily living, but by their religious zeal at the time of public worship, they would be able to help others in the Christian life.

2. That the last Sabbath in June be fixed as Congregational day, and that efforts be made to get every resident member of the meeting present.

3. That steps be taken to make the meetings impressive and the business sessions more attractive and profitable, especially to the young people.

The committee asked that it be continued for further consideration of the subject and until all the negligent members had been seen. Then followed a discussion that was unique in the annals of Slow Valley Meeting. Several commended the work that had been done, and welcomed the two families that had returned to the fold. The old physician felt that they had fallen upon strange times when they had to go out and beg the members to come to meeting. For himself, he did not believe in coercion, and doubted the ability of anybody to be a good Church member that had to be coaxed and coddled in the Christian life. One of the women felt that the meeting was dabbling in neighborhood gossip to have all these reasons dug up why this and that family did not come to meeting. The retired farmer was glad if any good was being done, but was inclined to the feeling that in the end no good would come to a meeting that had to be kept going by mechanical processes.

The young teacher, however, defended the work being done, and said that the problem was to see that a new degree of spiritual life was begotten in the heart of every member until the whole congregation became a virile, working organism of Christian believers, thoroughly united in the bonds of Christian fellowship.

The meeting finally decided to accept the recommendations of the committee, and the meeting on ministry and oversight was requested to make special provision for Congregational day, with the suggestion that an all-day session be arranged with a basket dinner on the grounds. Suggestion number three was referred to Committee No. 1 for consideration and action, and the Clerk read the concluding minute. The company tarried until the pastor had prayed earnestly for divine anointing and guidance in all the varied work of the congregation, and the company separated, wondering what was to be the end of the apparently strange course which they were being impelled to follow.

Is a Religious Upheaval Imminent?

Missionary Conference, held in Edinburg in 1910, and showed a marvelous growth during the intervening time.

The spiritual awakening that is so noticeable throughout the world, like every great movement in human history, is dependent upon some natural conditions. The world-wide movement toward social democracy during the last century has culminated in several republics and given men a taste of freedom, while the increased facilities for transportation and intercommunication have drawn the world of human spirits immeasurably nearer together. Then, the wealth of the world has increased more during the past fifty years than in all the centuries before.

Thus education, culture and material prosperity have prepared the way for the coming of the kingdom of God, and it is at our doors in a sense of which the seers and saints of old never dreamed.

Clarence Poe writes from Japan: "There half the world is waking up—the faith of the Christian grapples with the faith of the Buddhists, as the masterful aspirations of the western civilization surge against the old placidity of the east. And what shall be the outcome? Upon nothing else, it seems to me, depends so much as upon the religious foundation upon which Japan seeks to build the structure of the newer life. Some of the people are seeking to put the new wine of Christian civilization into the old bottles of Shinto and Buddhist ritualism. That this must fail is itself evident. Many others, like the iconoclasts of the French revolution, would sweep away all religion; but they will find that they are fighting against an ineradicable instinct of human nature, the innate craving of the divine in man."

This craving is the basis of the tidal wave of spiritual life which has set in, covering the whole globe. I discovered its approach in the Orient ten years ago, and it impels me to visit again those—and how many there are!—who sit in isolated places and in the land of the shadow of darkness.

The social service, which is taking such a strong hold of suffering humanity; the peace movement, which must triumph over brutality; the fellowship between nations and denominations, to say nothing of the missionary efforts to spread the everlasting gospel of our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ—all indicate the tremendous advance of that awakening which men instinctively feel is imminent.

Josephus Wrote About Jesus of Nazareth

"What historical evidence is there outside the Bible for the life of Jesus in Palestine?" This question, frequently asked in Bible classes, is usually answered simply by citing the brief allusion in Tacitus. There is, however, as all careful students are aware, a much fuller reference to Jesus in the eighteenth book of the "Jewish Antiquities" of Josephus—a passage which extols him as "a doer of marvelous works" and even declares that he was "the Christ." Both the crucifixion and the resurrection are explicitly spoken of. But it has not been considered candid to appeal to this testimony because the opinion of scholars, even of the most conservative scholars, has almost unanimously rated the whole paragraph to be an interpolation—not the words of Josephus at all but an addition which some overzealous Christian had written into his manuscript years later.

But the weight of authority on the question has been suddenly shifted by the appearance of an article in a German review, where Professor Harnack of Berlin, turning against his own former judgment, declares that the Jesus paragraph in the "Antiquities" is most probably (he is not quite willing to say certainly) a genuine part of the writings of Josephus himself and so an authentic outside testimony to the truth of the gospels. On early gospel history no other scholar in the world today has so great a name as Harnack, and with Harnack to back him, any Bible teacher without apology may bring in Josephus as a witness to the faith.

Harnack's change of front is significant not merely as bearing on this one matter, but also as an index of the way scholarship is trending in these days. It is no longer considered an indispensable mark of learning to black out the half of all ancient documents as spurious. The time has come when, without branding himself as unlearned and ignorant, a student may admit the strong presumption that ancient writers tried to write the truth, and ancient scribes for the most part tried to copy manuscripts honestly. Harnack's own conclusion that Luke's New Testament writings are reliable is another sign of the same sensible tendency, for here also Harnack himself once thought otherwise. The fact is that the boisterous criticism which bore on its banners the strange device, "Smash everything," is already off the field.—The Continent.

A Modern Miracle

"Of course, no one believes in miracles nowadays," said Mr. Hardy to his neighbor Mr. Clark.

"That depends on what you mean by 'miracles,'" said Mr. Clark, thoughtfully. "I believe in them myself."

"You mean that you think miracles occurred in the time of Christ. They certainly don't occur now. Miracles belong to the age of superstition, to the childhood of the race."

"I don't know about that," said Mr. Clark. "If you agree that a miracle is a change due to supernatural power, I can show you a miracle tonight right here in this city. Will you go with me, and promise to look and listen without prejudice?"

"Surely I will."

The two men met after supper that night, and Clark took his friend to a part of the city in which Hardy had never been before. They went into a little hall between two saloons, and took seats with a crowd of men and women so dilapidated in appearance that Hardy whispered to Clark: "What sort of a place have you got me into? This must be a meeting of all the 'downs and outs'."

"It is," said Clark, briefly.

After the leader had given out a hymn and made a short prayer, a big man with a voice of thunder rose and spoke.

For half an hour he poured forth a perfect torrent of appeal to that roomful of lost men and women. He begged, urged, commanded them to come to God.

When he sat down a score of men and women went forward, and the big man knelt and prayed for them in a voice so tender that Hardy found his face wet with tears.

He and Clark went out on the street. "Well," said Clark, "you have seen your miracle."

"I grant I have seen an interesting sight and heard a good temperance talk, but where is the miracle?"

"Nine months ago that man you heard was a professional gambler and thief. He has been in state prison six different times. He has spent a fortune in drink and vice. Today he is engaged in an honest trade. He has abandoned all his old habits, and every hour he can spare he labors to redeem lost men and women. He is a devout, prayerful man. I say he is a modern miracle, as great as any that Jesus Christ ever performed. Could anything except miraculous power make that man what he is tonight?"

Hardy was silent. Finally he said: "You are right. I shall never disbelieve in miracles again.—Youth's Companion.

In Memoriam

JOEL BEAN, Ætatis 88.*

Passed into the beyond,
Beyond our loving care,
Beyond our listening ear!
For in our meeting, though so old in years,
His voice was often heard;
How tenderly he spoke! Especially in prayer
His rich, deep tones uplifted to the heavenly throne
Will ever live in memory;
Pleading for faith—uprightness—
Help for himself, and for his fellowmen.
Ah! well he knew the road of faith,
The faith that's more than conqueror
Through Jesus Christ, our Lord.

There was no narrowness with him.
He held, in many ways, the "forward thought,"
And yet the old interpretations oft were his,
But he would show all kind forbearance
For others' views that did not meet his own.
Was any soul in trouble?
Most wisely he would guide—
Point to our Savior's sacrifice,
Yet not ignore the sacrifice of will;
Would plead for firm reliance
On Christ, the way of life,
To follow on to know the Lord.

Hearts have been strengthened
By witnessing the gentle life
Of Joel Bean—his all-compelling faith.
And now 'tis but a memory!
And yet, we hope that at some future day
We shall renew that intercourse,
Which, while on earth so true,
Must be more real in heaven.

San Jose, California. —Elizabeth Hjerleid Shelley.

E. H. S.

The following resolution was adopted by the Pastors' Union of San Jose and ordered placed upon the minutes and furnished the papers:

"WHEREAS, It has pleased Almighty God to remove from us, after nearly 70 years in His blessed service and after many years in our midst, our friend and brother, Joel Bean, of College Park, San Jose; therefore be it

"Resolved, That we hereby express our regret at the severance of the intercourse we have enjoyed with Joel Bean, and desire to record our appreciation of him as a sincere follower of the Lord Jesus Christ. Among his many happy personal characteristics we would register his earnest Christian life, his firm adherence to principle, charity of thought, winning manner and gentleness of expression. All that he said or did seemed grounded and rooted in love."

Tribute from his Sister

In connection with the decease of my brother, Joel Bean, January 11, 1914, in Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands, I remember that he and my sister, Hannah E. Bean, were endorsed by Indiana Yearly Meeting, before, as I believe, Iowa Yearly Meeting was established, and sent forth, under a religious concern, to visit as ministers, not only the Hawaiians, but also the missionaries laboring among them. This duty had been impressed upon his mind when seventeen years of age, and Titus Coar and his wife, the earliest missionary workers there, with several others have borne testimony to the great comfort and usefulness of their labors. He was a diligent student and reader of the Scriptures, believing very fully in the life, death, resurrection and mediation of the Lord Jesus Christ. He exemplified the truth that "religion is the life of God working in the life of man."

Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. CATHARINE M. SHIPLEY.

THAT CONFERENCE OF MEN

We continue to get a good many letters about the proposed conference of men, and we are sorry that we cannot give space to all. These are thoroughly representative, however, of what is being sent us.

A Young Friend.—Opposition to the meeting for men is another of those discouraging wet blankets being thrown upon every new vision of progress among Friends. If anything in historic Quakerism clashes with a present forward look toward greater efficiency, then the sooner it ceases to be a part of Quakerism the better. Otherwise, we would be perpetually bound to the standards of enlightenment of the seventeenth century.

But in this case there is no clash. The step is not backward, but wholly in line with an expanding but none the less historic Quakerism. If the meeting were to be official, or to have legislative power, our ideal of the equality of the sexes in church polity would be subverted. But a mere unofficial meeting for discussion and inspiration and greater vision, all recommendations to be acted upon by men and women jointly, is no more denying equality than our ladies' aid and missionary societies, or a men's Bible class. The Friends who would so jealously guard our historic ideals should remember that in the earlier form of Friends' business meeting, when this principle was in its virgin purity, the shutters were lowered between the men and women.

The logic that anything of advantage to men and women separately is good for them together, breaks down as absurd when carried into countless relationships. That there is a closer bond of fellowship, a greater freedom of discussion, a finer enthusiasm in some exclusive gatherings of either men or women, is a fact established by numberless occasions even in our own Church. That elusive but powerful bond that forms the vital spirit of the men's club, the ladies' society, all informal gatherings of either sex, can be utilized with tremendous effect by the Church. If most of the men themselves, can feel a greater burden and catch a broader vision, why should anyone quibble and question at a time when God is extending a mighty call for greater enlargement of life and service and the accomplishment of a world-wide task?

Edith Smith. Ackworth, Iowa.—I think such a conference would help the men to realize their responsibilities in the great tasks that are before those who would call themselves Friends of the Lord Jesus Christ. In too many of our meetings it is the women who feel the concern, and bear the burden, and do the work that is done. In some way the men should feel that the work is big enough to demand their ability and their effort. I have no fear that women will be too much left out. Conferences of women are especially helpful to women, and the men should be allowed to do something alone, if they can. Are separate conferences for men and women any worse than the separate meetings for men and women, or more of a violation of the principle of equality? The ancient custom has its advantages. Where the custom no longer holds, meetings for men or women are sometimes especially appointed, showing the existing need for meetings of this kind, at least occasionally.

E. J. Carter, Plainfield, Indiana.—With the first mention of the conference of men of our Church, it met my most hearty approval. Such a movement would certainly result in much good; not only to those who would participate in it, but through them to the Church at home. I most heartily approve it and suggest that it be held at some central point.

Charles T. Moore, Indianola, Iowa.—I have been intensely interested in the ideas expressed in THE AMERICAN FRIEND regarding a conference for men. I am heartily in favor of such a meeting, and am sure it would result in much good. Women are more free to express their ideas when together; the same with men. Men have things in common with men. I believe in women filling every place in the Church that men fill, but men are more apt to set an example for men and women for women. Men are just as religious as women, and the reason they have not been so interested as they should be, is because they have not had the vision, but they are going to have visions; it's the promise, and it is coming.

Mead A. Kelsey, Oskaloosa, Iowa.—To my mind anything that will enlist and arouse our men to come up abreast of their responsibilities in the Church ought to be welcomed by all. There is nothing un-Quakerly in such a program.

W. E. Dorland, Chicago.—I believe a men's conference, as suggested, would be a good thing, and the Friends ought not to be seriously divided on that subject.

O. M. Hanson, Sask.—I surely think that a conference of men would be a proper gathering to consider the demands that are being made upon us.

Israel J. Green, Freeport, Ohio.—I approve the men's meeting.

F. H. Tormohlen, Van Wert, Ohio.—I am still in favor of a men's conference.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SECRETARY

Announcement is made by Willard O. Trueblood, Chairman, that the Executive Committee of the Board of Young People's Activities of the Five Years Meeting, has secured the services of Thomas E. Jones to be the General Secretary of the Board. Mr. Jones is now attending Hartford Theological Seminary, but will give full time during the summer. He will be allowed, however, to finish his Seminary course. Full details will be worked out later. Those who know the new Secretary, know that he will put consecration, ability and spiritual zeal into the work.

UNITED MISSIONARY CONFERENCES

Arrangements have been made to hold a United Missionary Conference for the Sixth Indiana District at Rushville, Indiana, February 24, 25. It is earnestly hoped that a number of Friends in Dublin, New Garden, Spiceland, Walnut Ridge and Whitewater Quarterly Meetings will arrange to attend.

A similar Conference will be held at Plainfield, Indiana, on February 26, 27, which Friends of Plainfield, Danville, Fairfield and White Lick Quarters should attend. Another Conference will be held at Noblesville, Indiana, on March 1, 2, which should be attended by Friends of Carmel, Westfield and West Grove Quarters.

CORRESPONDENCE

WICHITA, KAN., January 31, 1914.

DEAR FRIEND—Permit me to congratulate you on the editorial in the last issue of The American Friend on "The Church Must Be United." It is one of the best editorials I have ever seen in the paper, and it meets with my hearty approval. As a matter of fact, Friends have spent more time and energy during the past twenty-five years in scrapping one another than they have in fighting sin. While I could not be anything but a Friend if I should try, it makes me heartsick sometimes to see so much wasted energy to no purpose.

O. C. EMERY.

CARTHAGE, INDIANA, February 7, 1914.

DEAR FRIEND—I desire to say that I heartily endorse the editorial of this week on the doctrine presented. I think if that "orthodoxy" can be carried out in all the Church, there will be a great awakening.

J. EDGAR WILLIAMS.

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING

Back Creek.—On December 26, Lloyd G. East and John I. Wright, of Cassopolis, Michigan, began a series of meetings at Back Creek, in the limits of Fairmount Quarterly Meeting. These services continued ten days and included eighteen sessions in all. The teaching was practical and helpful, resulting in a general uplift among the membership. Backsliders were reclaimed, and the Lord's blessing rested upon us in a marked degree.

South Union, Wabash Quarter.—South Union Friends' Sabbath School enjoyed a Rally Day January 11. A good program of songs, readings and short talks was rendered. At the church services following, the pastor, Edna R. Reddick, preached from Psalms 48: 13. On the Sabbath following, revival services commenced with Alice C. Lawrence, of Spiceland, Indiana, as evangelist. The old burden of sin was rolled away from seeking souls, and they are finding blessed joy in serving the Master. Others, who were the Lord's children, planted their feet on higher ground, and are seeing new beauties as they give themselves for a holy walk with God. The messages were so clear and the teaching so true to the Word that all were greatly blessed as they sat at the Master's feet from day to day.

Wilkinson, Indiana.—Joseph Youngs held a very successful revival meeting at this place. Brother Youngs preached the Gospel of Christ in its purity. Sinners were convicted and believers were strengthened. Forty-seven souls received a definite blessing. We praise God for sending his servant this way.

Van Wert, Ohio.—Van Wert Quarterly Meeting was held February 6-7. The attendance was small on account of the very severe snow storm, but what the meeting lacked in attendance was made up in interest and enthusiasm. At the meeting on Ministry and Oversight on Friday afternoon, a committee was appointed, one from each meeting, to see that a meeting of elders and overseers, together with the ministers, be held in each meeting before our next Quarterly Meeting, to discuss thoroughly the work of our elders and overseers, and to see whether at present they are occupying their gifts under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, as required by our discipline. Ancil Ratliff, our "Efficiency Secretary," was with us and did some excellent work. He spoke on Sixth-day evening to a good sized audience on "Bible School Work." On First-day he visited Prodigal Home Meeting in the morning, Antioch in the afternoon, and came back to Van Wert Meeting in the evening.

Vincent D. Nicholson, of Richmond, was also in attendance, and gave very strong messages both on Seventh and First-day morning. Milo Hinckle, of Lynn, Indiana, was delayed on the way coming here, and could only be in the meeting a short time on Seventh-day. From here he went to St. Mary's to assist in a revival meeting. Our Monthly Meetings (Van Wert, Prodigal Home, Mt. Pleasant and Antioch) are making great preparations for a meeting of all the men of their meetings to hold a conference on Tuesday evening, March 3. A twenty-five cent supper will be served, and we expect to have every man belonging to and some attending these meetings who are not members, to attend this meeting. Already great interest is being manifested. Charles Tebbetts and Ancil Ratliff are expected to be with us.

East Main Street, Richmond.—As a result of the recent union revival campaign in Richmond, the East Main Street Meeting, Truman C. Kenworthy, pastor, has had one hundred and twenty applications for membership. The Meeting is in a prosperous condition.

IOWA YEARLY MEETING

Hesper.—Winneschiek Quarterly Meeting was held at Hesper, Iowa, January 31 and February 1. General Superintendent, Harry R. Keates, was present. His gospel trumpet gave no uncertain sound, but Bible truths, tried and true, were sounded clear and plain, and hungry souls were satisfied at the gospel feast. On Sabbath morning the sermon was from the text, "Thy kingdom come." At the close of the able sermon, the whole congregation, with the exception of only two persons, arose to their feet in testimony that they were determined to let the Kingdom have the right of way in their lives. All the four sessions were blessed by the crowning presence of the Lord, and all lines of service blended in harmonious accord.

Lynnville, Iowa.—We have had the privilege of the presence and most helpful service of Frank W. Dell in a series of meetings, extending over a period of two weeks. The work done was of a character to establish men and women in the Christian life; as he presented Christianity, not merely as an experience, but as a plan of life lived in harmony with the thought and purpose of God for the individual. His lessons for the day meetings, which were of an expository character, were an especial blessing to those who were privileged to hear them.

Lynnville Friends are most fortunate in having associated with them in their work this year, Theron D. Harris and Leota Baldwin, as Principal and Assistant in the High School. They have, by their Christian character and excellence of scholarship, proven to all the worth of Penn College as a safe place for our boys and girls; they having both been members of the class of 1913.

Our Bible School has shown a most commendable growth during the past year. This increase has been so pronounced that at our last monthly meeting a committee was appointed to consider how we might best take care of the increase; either by enlarging the present house, or by building a new one.

The interest of Lynnville Friends in missions has been increased by their taking Mary E. White, of Jamaica, as their "Foreign pastor."

Sabbath, February 1, was observed by Friends here as "Go to Church" day. Large audiences were present both morning and evening.

KANSAS YEARLY MEETING

Burr Oak.—One of the most successful revivals ever held at Oak Creek has just recently closed. Charles and Eunice Hunt have been for the past two years serving as pastors at this place and at Walnut Creek (the two meetings constituting Walnut Creek Monthly Meeting). They have preached the Gospel of Jesus Christ in its true light, and when the pastoral committee decided to keep them for another year, they with the committee, planned and carried into effect the visiting of families in the vicinity, not slighting any family, whether they were members or not, and at the same time praying for God to send us an evangelist, which we believe was answered in the person of M. F. Swafford, accompanied by his wife, and for singing evangelist, his niece, Ella Swafford. They commenced meetings on January 4th, and held thirty-one sessions, which resulted in nineteen conversions, forty renewals, eighteen claiming sanctification, while fourteen were added to the church. The meeting closed on January 21st, and began at Walnut Creek the following Sabbath, with M. F. Swafford as the evangelist. Luther Dillon and wife, of North Branch, had charge of the song service, Ella Swafford being compelled to return to her home in Haviland, to take up her work in the Academy. She was accompanied by Mrs. M. F. Swafford. The power of the Lord was manifest in a marvelous manner from the very first. Twenty-two sessions were held, resulting in seventy-seven being definitely blessed, of which twenty-three were converted, forty-six renewed, and eight sanctified, and the entire membership blessed and built up. In these two meetings a number of men were made to see their filthiness and lay aside their tobacco, the Lord delivering them from the appetite.

While we give God the glory, we believe we ought to praise Him too, for the services rendered by our pastors, for we believe by their faithful labors, this harvest was ripe and ready for the ingathering. The people flocked to the altar from the beginning, and there was a thorough work done, such as we never witnessed here before.

OREGON YEARLY MEETING

Boise, Idaho.—The Church is feeling much encouraged over the work at this place. Our pastors, Oliver and Isabel Kenworthy, are doing excellent work. The pure Gospel is preached in all its fullness, and the power of the spirit wonderfully manifest in our midst. They began revival meetings the 4th of January, Ezra Pearson, from Greenleaf, coming to assist on the 12th. Meetings were held for seventeen days. There were some conversions and renewals, and the Church was generally built up. One man who has been under conviction for using tobacco for a long time, gave it up, and took the blessing instead. The ladies have formed an organization for the help of the work. They have made quite a little improvement on the inside of the church, which adds greatly to its appearance. A Junior Christian Endeavor Society has been organized of about twenty members. We have several active Christians among the children, who are not afraid to pray or testify in our regular church prayer meeting. Last week a Christian Endeavor Society was organized and much interest manifested. Three families have lately moved here, which is a great help to our work. Our young people's class has lately been organized and divided into two sections to work for new members. We expect good results. Our pastors also have charge of the work at Star, one of them going there each Sunday. The Lord is blessing that work also, and some are expecting to come into the Church at both places. They are now holding revival meetings at the Bowman School House. George Harvey, a former pastor, is caring for the work here while they are absent.

WESTERN YEARLY MEETING

Carmel.—Carmel Meeting has a pastor who has gone out into the evangelistic field, leaving his home meeting well provided for. He, Arthur Hammond, first conducted a series of meetings at Kokomo, Indiana, leaving his home meeting in charge of Flora Holiday the first Sabbath, Helen Ford the second, and Jefferson Ford the third, all of whom rendered valuable service. Next, Arthur Hammond went to Mooresville and held revival services, leaving his own meeting in charge of Edward Niles and wife, of Michigan, and Hannah Pratt Jessup, of Mooresville. Next, Charles Axton and Leora Bogue came to Carmel for revival service, assisted by the pastor, and much good was accomplished. Charles Axton preached the Gospel in its fullness in a very forcible, teachable and pleasing manner, creating in his hearers a greater thirst for a more extended knowledge of the Bible and its wonderful truths. Leora Bogue rendered valuable service in song, prayer, testimony and personal work. All these friends were welcomed into many homes to partake of hospitality and social service. Believers have been strengthened and the unsaved convicted. Many new resolves were made and much good has been accomplished. Arthur Hammond is at present conducting revival services at Quaker, Indiana, leaving Professor Pidgeon in charge of his home church.

WILMINGTON YEARLY MEETING

Center Quarter.—Center Quarterly Meeting was held at Wilmington, Ohio, February 7, 1914. In spite of a severe storm there was a good attendance. E. Gurney Hill, of Richmond, spoke at the morning session on the importance of foreign mission work. A missionary conference was held in the afternoon, with reports from different monthly meetings, and an address by E. Gurney Hill on the every-member canvass. There will be a considerable increase of missionary contributions in Center Quarterly Meeting this year.

Fifth Annual Congress.—The Fifth Annual Congress of the Wilmington Yearly Meeting Bible School Union will be held at Wilmington, Ohio, Friday, February 20, 1914. The speakers will be M. G. Bailey, Assistant State Secretary, and E. T. Albertson, State Super-

BIBLE SCHOOL LESSON

March 1.

Subject.—Trusting in Riches, and Trusting in God.

Lesson.—Luke 12: 13-27.

Golden Text.—Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also.—Luke 12: 34.

Time.—Early in A.D. 30.

Place.—Perea.

This is another one of those lessons in high moral obligation as well as Christian duty, so common in the teachings of Jesus. His was a new philosophy to the Pharisaical critics of that day. He preached no doctrine of expediency, but ever and always the doctrine of absolute right. Every problem was reduced to the lowest terms of religious obligation. Jesus saw the rights involved in every element in every question that affected the destiny of humanity. Henceforth there were to be new standards of conduct, both in the religious as well as the material world.

Bid my brother divide the inheritance. What a wrong conception of the nature of Christ's sovereignty! He had not come to earth to sit in judgment between disputants. When both brothers accepted the teachings of the Master, and threw off the sin of covetousness and grasping greed, then would the controversy adjust itself in the presence of a mutual unselfish desire to deal equitably upon the part of both. Jesus was neither legislator nor judge. His mission was to substitute fellowship and brotherhood for competition and strife, so that men would live above the necessity for law.

Consisteth not in the abundance. Life is not gold. Character is not property. Godliness is not material. It is a question of where the emphasis is placed. Property is not condemned except when it crowds out virtue and the righteous life. "Seek first the kingdom of God." "To make the widow's heart sing for joy" is worth more in the final reckoning of the ages than it is to own a continent and use it for selfish ends.

Take thine ease. The picture drawn by Jesus is the essence of the selfish life. The type can be seen in reality all about us. Men are living without a care for the higher and better things, with only a visionary thought of the future. There are men who subserve all else to political ambition, to social prestige, to the acquirement of wealth, to worldly pleasure. Jesus does not pronounce against these, except that they are made the chief end of life. His mission was to get things adjusted in their proper relationships.

Thy soul shall be required. "For what doth it profit a man, to gain the whole world, and forfeit his life?" How many there are who slave through life accumulating wealth for the heirs to quarrel over, and robbing themselves of those richer experiences which are the heritage of the righteous life! How many there are who sacrifice all for the lower self! Beyond the final judgment there is no repentance.

Rich toward God. He who is rich in good works, in character, in heart-life, has wealth beyond computation. "Sell that which thou hast * * * and come, follow me." Men get richness of soul through sacrifice, by selling all, by giving. The saintly life is not purchased by gold, but by faith and obedience; by trust and consecration.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR

March 1.

Topic.—Twelve Great Verses. III. The Love Verse. I. John 4: 16. (Consecration meeting.)

Ask some of the members to consider God's love to man. Others can consider man's love for God. Part of these can find texts to repeat. Others can be asked to make proper comment on the theme.

Still others can find quotations on love from the great authors.

How did God manifest His great love?

Why does God love man?

How is Christ's love manifested?

How may we love God supremely?

Why should we love God?

How can love replace hatred in the human heart?

PERSONAL MENTION

M. Davis Branon, of Iowa, has accepted the pastorate of the meeting at Mt. Airy, North Carolina, and has entered upon the work.

President Robert L. Kelly of Earlham College, has been invited to become a member of the National Citizens Committee, formed to bring about the calling of a third International Peace Conference at The Hague.

Professor Elbert Russell, who is a member of the Richmond city council, has consented to allow the use of his name as a candidate for nomination for Congress on the Progressive ticket from the Sixth Indiana district.

Elmer O. Wooton, who has a permanent position in the United States Department of Agriculture, has had the task assigned him of studying the vegetation of arid portions of the West, with the view of making them productive.

Royal J. Davis, who is one of the associate editors of the New York Evening Post, recently entertained the New York Quakerism Class at his home. He himself, gave an address on "John Bright's Relation to English Quakerism."

Leanah Hobson, who has spent the past year in England in Gospel work, has returned with her husband to this country, and has accepted the pastorate of the meeting at Fountain City, Indiana. She began her services there on February 8th.

OSKALOOSA, IOWA, February 6, 1914.

DEAR FRIEND—I want to express my appreciation of the editorial, "The Church Must Be Evangelistic." It strikes the evangelistic note just right, and points the way for the salvation of the Church. I like the "American Friend Day" plan, and we will be among those who observe it. The paper is increasing in strength and is growing in favor continually. That "Monthly Meeting Chronicle" is fine.

MEAD A. KELSEY.

SCHOOL TEACHERS

Also Have Things to Learn

"For many years I had used coffee, and refused to be convinced of its bad effect upon the human system," writes a veteran school teacher.

"Ten years ago I was obliged to give up my much-loved work in the public schools after years of continuous labor. I had developed a well defined case of chronic coffee poisoning.

"The troubles were constipation, flutterings of the heart, a thumping in the top of my head and various parts of my body, twitching of my limbs, shaking of my head and, at times after exertion, a general "gone" feeling, with a toper's desire for very strong coffee. I was a nervous wreck for years.

"A short time ago friends came to visit us and they brought a package of Postum with them, and urged me to try it. I was prejudiced because some years back I had drunk a cup of weak, tasteless stuff called Postum which I did not like at all.

"This time, however, my friend made the Postum according to directions on the package, and it won me. Soon I found myself improving in a most decided fashion.

"The odor of boiling coffee no longer tempts me. I am so greatly benefited by Postum that if I continue to improve as I am now, I'll begin to think I have found the Fountain of Perpetual Youth. This is no fancy letter but stubborn facts which I am glad to make known."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Write for a copy of "The Road to Wellville."

Postum now comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. Grocers sell both kinds.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

"American Friend Day"

We trust that the Friends of every meeting in America will remember that next Sabbath has been set apart as "AMERICAN FRIEND Day." Judging from hundreds of letters received at this office within recent weeks, THE AMERICAN FRIEND is filling a real need in the work of the Five Years Meeting, but far too many families are not being touched by its influence.

If the burden of the prayers and the religious exercises on next Sabbath can be manifested in behalf of this publication of the Five Years Meeting, we believe that the simultaneous effort will result not only in new interest being aroused but in a largely increased subscription list. As we have stated before, we need fully 2,000 more names on our subscription books before the paper is on a paying basis. Why may these not all be obtained next Sabbath?

There is a good deal of testimony to the effect that THE AMERICAN FRIEND is proving a source of inspiration and help to a number of local meetings. The sphere of its influence will be greatly increased if it can only reach a largely increased number of Friends families.

THE AMERICAN FRIEND is standing for a progressive Quakerism that we believe is not inconsistent with our history and manner of worship, and which we believe will enable the Society of Friends to keep abreast of the onward march of the Church universal, and to measure up to the great tasks of world redemption. The family that fails to read it during this year will miss an element of thought and will miss a vision that is too valuable to be lost.

We trust that in every meeting next Sabbath the claims of THE AMERICAN FRIEND will be urged upon the entire membership. Not only may subscriptions be taken at the close of the meeting, but some one can be designated to canvass the neighborhood for other subscriptions during the succeeding few days.

A special rate of $1.00 to new subscribers for the balance of this year is made, and ought to bring large returns. Let this be "AMERICAN FRIEND Day" in a real, helpful sense.

The New Era in Missions—The Mission Educational Course

The material is now on hand for the Foreign Mission educational course. Some of the announcements have already been sent out. They will be sent free to anyone sending two cents for postage. It is on the same plan as the Livingstone campaign last year, and is equally interesting. The two most essential books are, "The New Era in Asia" (Cloth, 58 cents postpaid), and "The World Call to Men of Today" (Cloth, 30 cents, postpaid). These books are thrilling in interest, and give the vision of the wonderful transformation through which the world is passing. A splendid Easter Service, with songs and recitations for children of different ages, entitled "The Triumph of Christ," can now be had (25 cents per dozen). Sample copies of this, together with Suggestions to Pastors as to sermons, and programs for prayer services, both of the church prayer service and the Endeavor service, will be sent on receipt of six cents in postage. These programs are prepared under the combined care of all the General Boards, together with the Women's Boards of United States and Canada. They bring great inspiration to all departments of the Church, and every meeting should take up at least some features of it. There are other features mentioned in the Announcement, for children and young people. Send for material and begin early, so as to get the full blessing of the climax in the Easter Services.

The Church Must Conserve Its Resources

The problem of the proper conservation of the resources and energies of the Church is one of vastly more than incidental importance. When Christ commanded Peter to feed the lambs of the spiritual flock, He was not dealing alone with a sustenance problem. To be born into the physical world raises a bigger question than the question of food and clothing and shelter. The interrogation point of every human life goes beyond the facts of mere existence and emphasizes what a man is, what he does, what he is capable of being and doing.

To be born into the kingdom of God is an equally portentous event, not alone for the new life that is begotten in the soul, but for its fruitage and the boundless possibilities of developing Christian character as a part of the world's most valuable assets. Plant and animal growth and fruitage are no less necessary parts of the physical world than is spiritual enlargement a vital law of the religious world.

The Church is too prone to make evangelism a matter of fits and starts. Too often when the special season of refreshing has ended, the evangelistic spirit soon flies to the four winds, leaving every new convert to take his chances in a strange atmosphere, where all too frequently the formalities of Church custom dampen the religious zeal and finally deaden the newly begotten life. The Church has been slow to learn how to take care of its new adherents.

The first vital element in the care of the spiritual flock is to perpetuate the evangelistic spirit. No Church can thrive without it. The Church that has it will not only see its members grow in the spiritual life, but new converts will be the rule at any time during the year. An exchange says that "Revivals of religion are normal phenomena of the world's advance in righteousness," but back of them must be the continuous life and consecration from which revivals spring. The abiding passion for the salvation of men is the only sure guarantee of conserving what has already been won for the Kingdom. Evangelism is an unvarying duty that can at no time be abandoned.

In the so-called revival season men are made to feel that religion is the supreme concern of life. When the revival is over, they are too apt to feel that it is a secondary consideration. They lose that keen sense of the presence of God which was so realistic in the warm atmosphere of the special refreshing. The trouble is not with God, and, generally speaking, it is not with the new converts. The trouble is with the atmosphere and the conditions into which they have been plunged. Losing the intensity of religious zeal and left all too often to serve an apprenticeship of their own designing, they naturally turn to outward observances and practices in the hope of commending themselves to God, with the results that many drift away before they really have had an opportunity to learn anything about the Christian life. Wandering in the miasmatic air of uncertainty and perplexing doubt, they die spiritually just as surely as the new-born infant dies from neglect and exposure.

No Church deliberately plans to be neglectful of its new adherents. So many have simply failed to learn how to be careful in a proper way of these new charges which have been committed to them. No Church is fitted to receive new converts, that is not able to maintain a warm, life-producing and life-developing atmosphere. The more men and women know of the Church, its life and its operations, the more they ought to be able to sense God in every thought, aspiration and act of their lives. It is a fundamental law of growth that the soil and atmosphere must be congenial, must be life sustaining.

Too many converts are lost within the first few weeks of their Christian profession, not, as a rule, because of the evangelism that brought the impulse and determination to lead them into the Christian life, but because the Church fails to assimilate them into its life and its mechanism.

The new convert needs not only a congenial atmosphere, but what is equally important he needs a peculiar kind of teaching and training. Every Church has a department of evangelism. Perhaps it ought to have a department of conservation, wherein spiritual life would be nourished, and out of which would be developed the normal activities of Christian service that establish character and guarantee permanency in righteous living.

Many men die religiously because they find nothing to do, for the same reason that many a child goes wrong because the guardians in the family do not take the trouble to set him to work constructively upon some concrete and congenial task.

Satan finds some mischief still
For idle hands to do.

The hollowness of idle pastime finds no relief in a mere profession of Christianity, and spiritual energies unapplied dwindle and become dwarfish as the weeks pass by. The Church must not only be potential in its life, but it must find a task for every willing hand. Evangelism is not worth perpetuating, if its fruitage is not to be cared for and properly conserved for the good of the Church and the glory of God.

The time is past due when the Church must learn the lessons of conservation, that both its spiritual life and its spiritual energies may be rightly safeguarded and properly applied for the great tasks of preserving its own life and of saving the world.

United Mission Canvass

BY CHARLES E. TEBBETTS

Will Your Meeting be Found in Line in the Great Movement for this United Mission Canvass in March?

Let this personal question come home with power to every reader of this paper. All the Church leaders feel that this is the most important movement ever undertaken by the combined authority of the whole Church. Of all bodies, Friends need just such an impulse as can be obtained from the simultaneous canvass in March. Is there life enough in your meeting to carry it through?

Last week's AMERICAN FRIEND presented the trumpet call that is being sent out by the Presbyterians. All the other leading Churches are sending out a like call. I wish to re-emphasize the plans suggested by the Presbyterian Manual as given last week, and to outline again the methods that have brought the largest success.

1. Give careful attention to the preliminary educational work. Most Friends have very imperfect conception of what the Church is in the world for. They want a good spiritual experience for themselves and the members of their families; but do not realize their responsibility for giving the Gospel message to the whole world, nor the wonderful way in which God is leading His Church just now in this world-wide task. In the meetings for worship and devotional services for two or three weeks, emphasis should be laid upon individual responsibility for service and stewardship, and this responsibility carefully prayed through. Instruct in the special responsibility of Friends for their own work in Foreign Missions, Home Missions, Church Extension, Peace, Temperance, and other departments for which the Yearly Meeting calls for funds. Remember that not one in forty in most meetings go to yearly meeting, or are at all well informed about the work of the church in detail. Upon the thoroughness of this preparation in education and prayer will depend the success of the effort.

2. Select canvassers early so they can meet once or twice to prepare themselves for answering the questions that will be asked. A little booklet, "Suggestions for Leaders in the Every Member Canvass," is very helpful here. Select one canvasser for every five families, so that the two who go together will not have to visit over ten places. Take no subscription in the face of the meeting. Let every family be visited at their homes. Unless the meeting is widely scattered, the whole canvass may be completed in a Sunday afternoon. Take sufficient time for preparation, but don't drag the canvass.

3. On the Sunday that the canvass is taken, let the morning meeting be one of special prayer and preparation for it. At the close of the meeting have the canvassers come forward and be commissioned on behalf of the meeting for that service, with prayer both for the canvassers in going out, and the people in receiving them. Let the whole work be organized in prayer, and carried out as a spiritual service. Encourage families to remain at home to receive the canvassers that afternoon.

4. Secure contributions from every member, man, woman, and child, both members and attenders. Giving is worship as much as prayer, and everyone (I. Cor. 16-2) should feel they have a part in it. With the child it is specially important as a matter of right education. Take the contribution on the weekly basis. Each person, realizing that all we have belongs to the Lord, should make it a matter of prayer how much he ought to spend for himself, and how much should be used as belonging to the Lord's share for reaching others with the Gospel and perfecting His Kingdom on earth.

5. It is a great advantage for the churches of each community to make the canvass at the same time. Far better results are thus secured.

6. In the Bible, faithfulness in giving is always accompanied with promises of rich blessing. Expect rich returns in spiritual blessing, and in outward blessings as well, for the Church as a whole (Mal. 3: 10-12).

7. Do the best you can this year, even if you have not had access to one of the United Mission Conferences. The experience this year will be helpful to a better canvass next year.

8. When canvass is completed, report to AMERICAN FRIEND the results, with statement as to how it was made. This will be valuable for future reference.

Doing Our Best with the Bible School

BY WALTER W. HAVILAND

(CONCLUDED)

In reply to the question why so many young people in their late teens stop going to Sunday School, the prevalent opinion was that it was because of failure to be interested. One said, "Boys and girls seem to fight against being interested"; some thought the fault lay wholly with the pupils, others that the Schools were entirely to blame, and one that the fault should be equally divided. Other answers were that it was a waste of time and they didn't get any real good out of it; that as one grows older he has so much else to do that really is interesting that the Sunday School gets crowded out; that it is monotonous to hear the same things year after year; that there is not enough life; that the methods of the Sunday School are suited to younger pupils, which impress older boys and girls as babyish and cause them to lose interest unless a special effort is made for them. One of the boys wrote that since so many fellows work all the week they want Sunday for something else. He thought "a fellow over 18 might well be excused from Sunday School if he attends church, for the Sunday School has fulfilled its work if it has started him right." Another boy wrote: "When a fellow reaches the ripe age of 18, in the prime of young manhood's full strength, he is so good and true and noble and upright and superior that he puts away childish things."

One of the girls who had given up going to Sunday School wrote as follows: "I think it is the fault of the Sunday School entirely. They do not give us any real work to do in preparing our lessons, but let us sail along in the same way through our recitations with the answers principally given by the teacher. They do not put the necessary vim and will in back of it all so that it gets monotonous and they do not seem to think up anything for us but let us drop out, and after two or three visits from the teacher, they think they have done their duty, whereas if they could get down to it in earnest and give us something different, we would become interested again I am sure."

A question as to the right order of emphasis in the aims of the Sunday Schools brought out practically the united judgment of the class that the knowledge of the facts contained in the Bible should be subordinate to inspiration to right living and the teaching of Christian principles and ideals which affect moral character. Only two out of the whole class put knowledge first, and one of these said knowledge was important only as it led up to inspiration and character. The request to tell how the Sunday School could be made more useful to younger children brought the following answers:

1. Get teachers who appeal to children.
2. Select better and more mature teachers, who will take more time in the child's interest.

3. Give them young teachers in sympathy with little folks.

4. Make the people of the Bible more like people of today.

5. Provide plenty of social entertainment.

6. Have shorter sessions, so they will not lose their attention.

The question, How could the Sunday School be made more helpful to young people of your own age, elicited:

1. The Sunday Schools generally have good intentions, but they are not very often carried out.

2. Have better teachers and less ritual.

3. Interesting, lively teachers, who can vary the conversation, work and study in a practical way so that interest never lags.

4. Have social life and congenial companions who bring up interesting discussions.

5. Do away with snobbishness and have less of social inequality shown.

6. Good music and lively songs keep things moving. More enthusiastic leader in singing.

7. Have time for questions and free discussion.

8. That the teachers instead of keeping right to their lessons would study the pupils and thus be able to tell them things that would help them individually, by talking right to us and not be afraid of saying what is right and wrong.

9. "Connect the things we learn with our daily lives, and not just learn facts and not connect them in any way with ourselves."

10. Deal more with moral and social questions than with the Bible.

11. Reach out beyond the four walls and have connection with outside organizations, such as some charity.

These answers, representative of the honest thought and real experience of young people at the age when they are the greatest problem of the Sunday School, have furnished me with the raw material for a good deal of thinking. I know a good many of my weak points in teaching Bible classes in both day schools and First-day schools have been exposed. I am pretty well convinced that I have not done my best, though my "intentions have been good." If the coming year's work does not improve over last year's, the responsibility will be mine.

It will not do to cheapen our Bible School work. We must dignify and enrich it. The strength and resources of the meeting must be put into it. The office of religious teacher must be magnified. The intellectual equipment, the moral fibre, and the social charm of our most gifted members must be drafted for the service of the Bible School. Bible teaching must be made so intelligent as to win the respect of the scholars; it must be so practical as to start the impulses of life. The teacher needs to be the intellectual master of the words, the forms, the environment, the social background, the local color of the bit of Biblical literature which he presents. He needs, too, to know life and to understand the intellectual and emotional processes and crises through which we all pass. He must feel himself in touch with the source of life, and want to be a channel of inspiration to the lives of others. With this equipment and this concern on the part of the teacher the Old Book will begin to live and to be instinct with meaning for the pupil. The meaning of the message will become clear and the heart will be warmed by the moral passion and religious devotion that burned in the souls of the inspired men of long ago. As they come to see the meaning of the message to that day and to those souls, they may be inspired by the Spirit who inspired that message to apply it to their own day and their own souls. The spiritual results of giving our intellectual best to the study of the Bible cannot be estimated; but intellect alone is not enough. If we bring to every problem that comes up in connection with our Bible School work our very best in thought and service and prayer, who can estimate the spiritual and moral power that might be generated in our Bible Schools? Let us consecrate the best that is in us to organize and develop Bible schools and classes, so as to make Biblical learning bring forth fruit in the Biblical type of life.

A Monthly Meeting Chronicle

BY JUNIUS JUNIOR

VII.

Midsummer had come, and the July session of Slow Valley Monthly Meeting experienced something of the languor that this season of the year produces. Notwithstanding this, however, seventy-eight members were present, including five children, a record attendance which had never been equaled before at a Monthly Meeting in the annals of the congregation. Something had borne fruit, and there were those in the gathered company who, against their wills, were forced to admit that the meeting was taking on new life under the searching examination which was going on.

A note of praise ran all through the devotional service, and to the surprise of many, two young men and a young woman took a brief part in the vocal worship. There were several references to the great spiritual uplift that had come at the congregational meeting arranged for a month before, and the pastor preached with an unction that brought a look again and again from several who were accustomed to sit with downcast eyes throughout the period of worship.

The business meeting was mainly devoted to matters pertaining to the new regime, as one of the members styled it. It was reported that during the four preceding Sabbaths there had been an average gain of fourteen in attendance at the morning meeting and this despite the warm weather. It developed that the congregational meeting on the last Sabbath in June was a great success in more ways than one. It was reported that of the 142 resident members 127 were present, while seven others were found to be absent from the community. Several mentioned the presence of a number who in various ways had formerly been connected with Friends, while many others connected with other churches and with no church were present throughout the day.

A number remarked that the spiritual feast which had been spread for them by the pastor, the resident minister and a visiting brother had been truly refreshing, while the social fellowship at the noon hour had brought everybody closer together with a feeling that they had many interests in common. One old lady remarked that she had never in all her life seen an occasion when the burden of the meeting and the spiritual welfare of the neighborhood was so much the subject of general conversation as on that day. On all hands it was agreed that the crust of formality and indifference had at least been broken, and even the retired farmer expressed satisfaction at the result.

Then came the second installment of the report of Committee No. 2, given by the young school teacher. The Committee had devoted itself largely to the task of seeing that everybody had had a special invitation to the congregational meeting, taking care to make it plain that the invitation was permanent and applied to all the religious services of the meeting throughout the year. A great deal of indifference had been manifest, but the Committee felt that the personal work that had been done by bringing an official committee of the meeting face to face with each member, in order to reveal the interest which the whole body had in its entire membership, had done more than anything else to break through the shell of negligence which had surrounded so many families. The report cautioned the members not to expect too much in the way of permanent results from this first effort, but emphasized the necessity of perpetuating a warm religious and brotherly atmosphere in connection with the social life of the congregation and the religious exercises both at the Sabbath and at the business meetings. It was recommended that there be a permanent committee on invitation and welcome, whose duty it should be to be on the lookout for any and all, both members and non-members, who would probably enjoy the fellowship of this particular congregation.

This was agreed to without special opposition, although it was noticed that a dozen or more men and women of prominence took no part in this discussion. The fact that the attendance on Sabbath since the congregational meeting had shown a substantial increase was its own best testimonial that personal work and manifested interest were the elements needed to revive the community to a new sense of its religious obligations and privileges. This Committee which had been making a canvass of the members, with the young school teacher as chairman, was constituted the permanent committee on invitation and welcome, and the Clerk asked if Committee No. 1 was ready to make its report.

The Chairman, who was our farmer friend, said the task which had been assigned to his Committee appeared to be formidable, and they were unable to do much beyond reporting progress. Much of the mechanism under which the meeting was operating was inseparably connected with the machinery of the Yearly Meeting, and appeared to be both complex and cumbersome over much. It was felt that there were too many departments, and that more work than was now being attempted could all be grouped as separate divisions of a few departments, with a financial saving and a safeguarding of the energies of the church. Whether or not the Monthly Meeting could accomplish anything of itself in this direction was still a question, and the Committee would like further time on this phase of its work.

The Committee had given considerable attention to the financial plan of the meeting and was united in proposing some rather radical changes. By an elaborate presentation of the question it was shown that several families did not pay their assessment with the result that frequently there was a deficiency which over and over again had had to be made up by others who were meeting their assessments in full. It was argued that the general lack of interest had been the occasion of financial looseness.

The Committee condemned the assessment plan, and recommended that collections be taken upon a voluntary basis at the Sabbath morning services, and that the duplex envelope be used both for current expenses and for the benevolences. The Committee had investigated the new United Missionary Campaign now being formulated for all the denominations under the care of the Laymen's Missionary movement, and believed that the meeting should avail itself of the opportunity offered next spring to enter upon the every-member canvass for the support of the church.

The report provoked a lively and extended discussion. There was strong opposition to dropping the assessment plan and also to taking an offering in the Sabbath services, which it was felt would cheapen the meeting for worship and arrest the spirit of communion with the Father. On the other side it was urged that this was the Lord's work, and, as at other places, the Sabbath offering brought in more money under the use of the envelope plan.

No conclusion was reached, the subject of the finances being postponed until the September meeting for further consideration. The Committee was continued in charge of other matters which had been referred to, and the meeting adjourned with an earnest prayer by the resident minister that God would give wisdom and lead the membership into the clear light of day, where they might see with clearer vision the path which as a congregation they should follow.

The Witches of Endor

BY O. L. MILES

When Saul, the son of Kish, was made king over Israel, Samuel, the prophet, was God's spokesman in Israel. Saul at that time was obedient to the commands of God as they fell from the lips of the prophet. He served the true God, the God of his fathers. He drove the fortune tellers (witches), "grafters and fakirs" out of the country.

As the nation under his rule grew strong and prosperous, Saul became indifferent and forgot God. Samuel on several occasions very sharply rebuked him for his faithlessness and unbelief. In the first book of Samuel we read where Saul disguised himself and went to the woman of Endor, who was said to have "familiar spirits." By marginal reference she was called a witch.

Saul had plunged so deep into sin that God had forsaken him, and before Samuel's death had informed him through Samuel that the kingdom would be taken from him. His successor had been anointed by Samuel. Saul was swiftly nearing his tragic end. He had become involved in a war with the long-time enemy of the Jews, the Philistines. Because of his sins and follies his unconquerable ally, Jehovah, had withdrawn from him and left him to his own resources. The war was going against him. Samuel was dead. No help came from God. The enemy was pitched before him ready for battle. In his extremity he went to the witch of Endor.

In the olden times thus we see people believed in witches—persons possessed of unnatural powers. Able to commune with the dead and foretell future events, and to be able to bring to pass good or evil at will. Even after the settlement of our own dear America, people were burned to death in some of the settlements, for they were thought to be witches.

In this enlightened age we no longer believe in witches. But we do believe that there are whims, moods, spirits or fancies working on the mind of man that build character, good or evil, as the case may be. They play upon the passions of mankind as surely as the witches of old are reputed to have done. We will bring some of them to the light of day, and for lack of better name call them witches.

There is that old witch, Jealousy, that ambassador of Satan, which taking possession of a soul enslaves it as completely as did any witch of old enslave her victims. There are no depths of human degradation to which a jealous soul will not descend to accomplish its ends. Then there is Malice, that terrible monster that will cause its victims to wilfully misrepresent, by insinuations and untruths, any one, no matter how beautiful a character they are led to attack. Another one is Envy. What a miserable life the envious soul lives! Ah! Because some one else has more friends? Because some one else shines brighter socially? Because some one else has a brighter intellect? Shall we, like Saul, consult the witch? This witch of Envy? It will but lead us to another, Hate.

There is another witch called Greed. Greed is that witch which causes her victims to strive for wealth. It is because of greed we hear of frenzied finance and soulless corporations. Greed makes people defraud their fellows, and "Crook the pregnant hinge of the knee that thrift may follow fawning." It's money makes the man, "no matter how it's gotten," says Greed. Another one, Pride, vain pride. People who are enthralled by this witch will tell you that they have more money than some one else, therefore, somehow they must be better. How they carp and fawn; striving for the acquaintance of the wealthy, that they may appear wealthy also.

But the soul that forgets God and is led astray by these witches will cry when the evil day comes, "Woe is me, God will not answer," and, like Saul of old, it shall perish, utterly.

A Friend's Funeral

BY JOHN W. DORLAND

In California the percentage of the days are warm and bright and full of sunshine, but there come times when the sun scarcely pierces through the thick clouds that hang dark and lowering over the country. On this particular day the mountains that lie to the northeast of the city of Pasadena could barely be distinguished and the chill and gloom spoke of late fall in the east. Amid these surroundings a group of people clustered around the steps of the Friends Church waiting for a gray undertaker's van that drew up to the curb with a long line of automobiles behind it.

The hysterical sentimentality that attracts a certain class of people to funerals because they are funerals, was wholly lacking here; these were friends and relatives who had come to pay their last respects to the dead. After the light gray casket with its blanket of flowers had been placed before the reading desk, and immediate relatives and friends had been seated, a hush settled down over that company, and the Holy Spirit came and hovered over sad hearts there in the stillness of the darkened room.

A President of a well-known Friends College offered prayer, asking that strength might be the portion of the bereaved husband and father, and comfort be poured into the hearts of the children left behind, that grace might be given to say, "Not my will, O Lord, but thine be done!" A young lady sang very sweetly and in perfect sympathy that hymn that gives us the assurance that "there shall be no night there" and that God Himself shall wipe away all tears.

The remarks of the pastor held out for the larger hope beyond the grave, that if the parting be sad, how much more joyful would the meeting be over yonder in the land of the endless days. He spoke touchingly of the life of the departed one, that such lives filled with good deeds and kind words must count heavily when "The roll is called up yonder," that this old world needs the love and care of good mothers, so that at last when the final summons comes, "her children shall rise up and call her blessed."

A closing prayer by a minister in the body of the meeting, and then one by one we filed by to take a last glimpse at the face of our departed friend. How one is impressed over and over again in looking at death, and the mummylike mask it throws over a face, once full of life and animation, of the words of the angel at Christ's tomb—"He is not here, He is risen," and this seemed to be the thought then—she is not here, she is risen.

Some of us did not go to the cemetery, but we heard how the family gathered around the grave and sang, "Shall we gather at the river, where bright angels' feet have trod," and then for a fleeting instant, how the setting sun burst forth, flinging its blood red banners to the sky, and then darkness again. In the final analysis it may be said of her, as it was of that great company described in Revelations, "These are they that have come up out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

A large number of prominent churchmen on the Pacific Coast have signed a paper asking churches and other similar bodies to adopt resolutions in favor of the proposition to secure an international agreement between our government and that of Great Britain providing for a year's suspension of the naval programs of the great powers, and further, that these same organizations approve the utterances of various chambers of commerce in favor of treaties of arbitration with England and other countries.

The Joint Commission on Social Service of the Protestant Episcopal Church has just issued a book containing twenty odd addresses made under the auspices of the Commission, during the recent Episcopal General Convention. The book, which also contains reproductions of charts exhibited at the recent Convention, and other matter, is an interesting contribution to the literature of the relation of the Church to the social problem.

THE GENERAL SECRETARY

The Home Missions Council

The aim of the Home Missions Council is to promote co-operation among Christian organizations doing missionary work within the territory of the United States and its dependencies. Practically all the leading Protestant denominations are represented in it,—the Friends, by the Associated Committee on Indian Affairs and the Church Extension Board of the Five Years Meeting. Its seventh annual meeting was held in New York City on the fourteenth and fifteenth of January. At the request of the General Secretary, Thomas Elsa Jones, now studying at Hartford Theological Seminary, was in attendance, and prepared the following notes of its proceedings for the AMERICAN FRIEND.

Report by Thomas Elsa Jones

"In the first, place it was apparent in all the discussions that denominational lines must no longer hinder the coming of the Kingdom of God, but they must contribute to its advancement. It was pointed out by many of the speakers that churches had failed significantly to meet the demands of Christ in needy fields because of their unwillingness to work together. Again and again it was shown how one denomination has encroached on the territory of another, with confusion and strife as the result. New church buildings have been erected in districts already overchurched. There has been much blind stumbling forward in trying to deal with the problems of the rural and downtown churches. Strong expression was given to the feeling that denominationalism should not be built up for its own sake, but that the Kingdom of God should be advanced by each denomination developing the essence of its own special message to its broadest, fullest and deepest meaning.

"In the second place, the Council emphasized the need of experts in Home Missionary work. The Foreign Missionary Societies have done much in their department by placing experts in the field. They have studied scientifically both the home base and the foreign field. The Home Mission work has suffered from lack of this very thing. We have been too content to leave what we regarded as well enough alone, while God's work has failed for want of leaders. Our little churches continue in the same way, ministering to the few, while a great unoccupied field has grown up about us. We are just beginning to appreciate that such a field exists and that its needs are great. But as yet, we do not know how to meet the situation. We need experts to study the immigrant problem, the down-town problem, the Negro situation, and the needs of the rural fields. Secretaries are needed, whose business is not merely to gather statistics, but also to lay down lines upon which practical work may be done. Such Secretaries may cost us something, but, as Dr. Yarrow, of Chicago, pointed out, if a telephone company considers it worth while to spend fifty thousand dollars surveying the field before establishing its business, certainly the Church can afford to spend some money in research work. Dr. Yarrow further argued that the Y. M. C. A. is able to procure large sums of money for its work because it does much preliminary work in surveying the field and cataloging its needs. Business men are willing to give to an enterprise in which they can see a future.

"Great emphasis was laid upon the need of more evangelistic work among the foreigners. It was suggested that a city be divided and each church be assigned a certain section to evangelize. In other places certain denominations should be assigned the task of evangelizing and caring for certain nationalities or races of people that are within our borders. Missionaries should be trained to work among these people. They should be able to speak their language; know their problems, and meet them on a common basis for work.

"In the discussion of the problem of the rural field, attention was called to the very little that has been done to really analyze the situation. It does not need to be demonstrated that the country schools are inefficient for retaining the ambitious and intelligent among the country people in rural residence. The fact has many advocates that there is not sufficient recreative life in the country. It is becoming quite generally believed that the churches and schools in the country should encourage and perhaps, provide recreation for young people. Most of the denominations are turning with deep interest to the scientific study of the country situation. Some of these are the United Presbyterians, the Baptists, the Moravians, and the United Brethren. In a body of Christian people, such as the Friends, with nearly three-fourths of its membership in small towns or the country, there is great need for study along this line.

"The final note of the Council was, How can its suggestions be made practical? What can the churches do now? Among the answers were the following: Try to interest every member in some practical religious activity outside of merely attending services; let each become an evangelist; a personal worker or educator. Push Home Mission Week; study our home problems, and organize for work."

Current Items of Interest to Friends

CALIFORNIA YEARLY MEETING

Whittier.—The usual number of tourists have been enjoying the ideal southern California winter, and among them many Friends.

During the past few weeks some events of special interest in connection with the Whittier Meeting have occurred. On February 2d Thomas Armstrong, aged eighty-two years and a minister for more than fifty years, spoke to a large congregation in which were many of his former students, acquaintances, and friends in other states, besides many who have known him in more recent years. His message was strong and impressive.

The evening meeting was under the direction of the delegates from Whittier College to the recent missionary conference in Kansas City, and their reports were full of interest and enthusiasm.

On Second month 8th, Robert W. Douglas, who is spending some weeks in Whittier visiting his brother, John Henry Douglas, preached at the morning meeting. His message was vigorous and timely. He has here besides his immediate relatives a large number of friends and acquaintances of other years. He will be in attendance at the Quarterly Meeting to be held here February 21st.

On the evening of February 8th, a class of ten students of Whittier College, who had finished the teacher training course, received diplomas. The address of the evening was given by Dr. Henry A. Dowling, Secretary of the California Sunday School Association.

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING

Carthage.—The two weeks' revival service which began on the 18th of January, under the leadership of the pastor, J. Edgar Williams, was marked with interest and good attendance from the first. The sermons throughout were earnest and forceful. On Monday evening the Bible lesson was given by the audience repeating texts from James. An impressive consecration service followed during which the entire congregation with the exception of five, knelt in prayer. This was the keynote to the meetings which followed. Miss Leora Bogue was present the last week with helpful messages of song. On the last Sabbath the text for the morning was "Come thou and all thy house into the ark"; the theme was "All the family for the Lord." The text for the evening was John 3: 16. At the close of this last service almost all of the vast congregation went forward and took the pastor by the hand as evidence of their appreciation of the Christian religion.

Milton, Indiana.—Following a week of prayer, Miss Nettie Springer, accompanied by Miss Effie Minehart, began a series of meetings January 4th, continuing seventeen days. The preaching was in the power and demonstration of the Spirit, and souls were moved by the mighty power of the Holy Spirit to repentance, renewal and full salvation. The Scriptural doctrine of entire sanctification was clearly and sweetly presented, and some pressed into its blessed experience. The work in the Church was of the deepest kind and the Church stands today renewed in her spiritual life, and is looking forward to enter upon a larger life of service.

The "Bible Readings" given by Miss Springer were of the clearest and most convincing ever heard in this place, showing that it was God's plan from the beginning that His believers should be freed from the power of sin. About forty claimed definite blessings. Miss Springer and Miss Minehart are untiring workers, and sing and preach full salvation. We recommend them to anyone who is in need of help. Praise God from whom all blessings flow.

Rockford, Ohio.—On February 15th the special revival services at Rockford closed with a high note of victory for the Kingdom of Jesus Christ. There were about thirty at the altar for pardon or purity. Every one received a definite blessing, except two or three who were not willing to pay the price. Fourteen definitely sought and received the baptism with the Holy Ghost. We feel that the deepest and most thorough work has been done in the history of the Friends' Church in Rockford. The evangelist engaged for the meeting was Lindley A. Wells, of Portland, Oregon. He was clear and definite in his teaching, sound in doctrine, and convincing in his arguments. Many who heretofore opposed the doctrine of entire sanctification as a second definite work of grace, received light and definitely sought and obtained the blessing.

Raysville.—Five or six of the members of Raysville Meeting belonging to Spiceland Quarter met one evening, feeling the necessity of a spiritual revival, not knowing of any help they could get, and commenced holding meetings on the 18th of January. They solicited Divine help from Him who is able and willing to give to those who ask. He heard the call and after four or five days of earnest prayer, Marticia Carter, of Indianapolis, an earnest, devout, spiritual minister of Friends, turned her feet this way, and although seventy-five years of age, went into the work earnestly, and in a day or two was joined by Everitt Worth, of Dunreith. They held the most successful revival meeting that was ever held here, resulting in forty-eight conversions and eighteen renewals. Fourteen received sanctification, and thirty-one gave their names for membership with our Church. Over one hundred were definitely blessed. A large porportion of the converts were children from eight to fifteen years of age, and gave good, clear testimonies of their spiritual condition.

Winchester.—Winchester Friends, under the very efficient leadership of the pastor, Frank Cornell, observed the week of simultaneous meetings. Each subject, as suggested by the Evangelistic Committee, was presented in an intelligent, scholarly and dignified way, and the Holy Spirit, ever faithful in His office work, impressed the truths on the hearts of the thinking people, and we believe great good was accomplished in a quiet, thoughtful way, that will be lasting. Following each sermon, there was a time of impressive, prayerful silence, when the baptism of the Holy Spirit rested on the congregation, and we have no doubt but that during those times many were led to open the door of the heart and let the Savior in. Our meetings for many months have been well attended both at the morning and evening service, and our average attendance for the last two years has been more than for a long time previous. Our Bible School is steadily increasing in interest and in numbers. For some months the average attendance has been three hundred and fifty, and often reaches the four hundred mark. Our highest number was on "Church going day," and reached four hundred and forty. The other activities of the Church, the Young People's Society, the Ladies' Aid, the Missionary, and the Messenger Societies are all moving on with unabating interest. On the 28th of January, the Messenger Society, with a membership of seventy ladies, held its annual rally meeting, which was also guest day. There were sixty guests present. At this time the annual report was given, which showed that the Society had made one thousand calls, and had given ninety-seven bouquets, besides a large amount of clothing and groceries. The pastor gave a talk complimenting the Society on the splendid work done, after which Mrs. Charles Ballard read an original poem on the "Influence of Women." A very pretty duet was also sung. At the conclusion of the business details the people were invited to the basement, where they were served to dainty refreshments by Mrs. Otho Moorman, Mrs. Ida Baily, Mrs. Osee Myers and Mrs. Minnie Wilmore.

IOWA YEARLY MEETING

Minneapolis, Minnesota.—Elizabeth Thompson left Minneapolis February 11th, for an extended visit with relatives and friends in Los Angeles, Pasadena, and other points in southern California.

The work of English Friends was discussed at the February meeting of "The Quakerism Class." The discussion was led by Mrs. Anne Howard, who has made a careful and thorough study of the "Friends' Forward Movement" in England. Her address was most instructive and inspiring. The aims and ideals of English Friends, their steadily increasing membership, and the significance of such movements as Woodbrooke and the Adult School were vividly and forcibly presented. The study of such growth and achievement is a splendid incentive to greater activity and purpose on our own part. We can face our problems with a greater enthusiasm and a finer spirit, and look forward with increased confidence to the future of the Quaker message. Many expressed the hope that from this lesson of living Quakerism, our own meeting might feel and reflect much of the splendid spirit of our English Friends.

Earlham.—Bear Creek Quarterly Meeting was held at Earlham February 14th and 15th. H. R. Keates was present and preached on Friday evening and on Saturday. Clark Brown spoke on Saturday evening and on Sabbath evening. B. B. Hiatt brought the message Sabbath morning. Roy Bogue, of Canby, Carrie Curtis, of Stuart, and William S. Kitch, of Bear Creek, were also in attendance. The work in this Quarterly Meeting is moving forward along all lines.

KANSAS YEARLY MEETING

Eudora.—We have been having a revival meeting of three weeks commencing the 4th of January, held by Frank Allee, Evangelistic Superintendent of Cottonwood Quarterly Meeting, Kansas, assisted by our pastor, John D. Mills. The messages were accompanied with the power of the Holy Spirit, reaching the hearts of the unsaved; renewing those who had grown cold and indifferent, and putting new life into the Church, so that we can take up the work with renewed courage and faith. Sixteen have handed in their names wishing to join the Church, and there are more we hope, will join us later.

Haviland.—The series of meetings recently held at Haviland, Kansas, by Susie F. Wilcot, was a blessing to the Church and community. Her teaching was spiritual and practical, a stimulus to all to live purer and nobler lives. There were several conversions and renewals.

Haviland Quarterly Meeting was held at Haviland, Kansas, February 13-15, 1914. No visiting ministers were present. Our home ministers seemed to be especially favored to meet the needs of the Church. Abel J. Bond very acceptably addressed the meeting Saturday morning at ten o'clock, and Charles Lescault on Sabbath morning, from Isaiah 32: 2. William Pribbenow, Yearly Meeting Superintendent of the Christian Endeavor department, was present, and did efficient work. On Saturday at the business session, we were very much encouraged when a $10,000 endowment fund was raised in the face of the meeting for Haviland Academy. We hope to double the endowment.

NEW YORK YEARLY MEETING

Twentieth Street, New York City.—David E. Sampson, a minister of the Gospel from North Carolina, with his wife, Mary Sampson, an elder, attended Twentieth Street Friends' Meeting, New York City, on Sunday morning, February 15th. He vividly presented the essential importance of a faithful obedience to the impressions of the Holy Spirit in the work of the salvation of men. He also spoke effectively to the destitute men gathered in the basement of the Twentieth Street meeting house on Sunday morning and Monday evening, under the care of the Adult School. From five hundred to eight hundred of these men assembled there on First-day morning. David E. Sampson and wife expect to sail for England on the steamship Campania on Fourth-day morning, February 18th, having a Minute from their Yearly Meeting for gospel service in London and Dublin Yearly Meetings.

OREGON YEARLY MEETING

Portland.—Since much has been said and done and properly so, to encourage the young people to take their place in the work of the Church. Homer L. Cox, the pastor of the meeting at Portland, Oregon, himself a young man, advanced the thought that the attention due the old people should not be forgotten. By reason of this, arrangements were made and a recent Sabbath morning meeting was set apart and observed as an old people's meeting. Effort was made to secure the attendance of as many of them as possible, conveyances being provided for those who would otherwise not be able to attend. The exercises of the hour were appropriate to the occasion and helpful to all. B. F. Hinshaw, an aged minister, with his wife, sang one of the old gospel hymns much used in past years. Testimonies were given by some who have been long in the Way and find it good. On February 8th at our Bible School, among those who gave their birthday offerings, was Mary Jane Cook, eighty years of age on that date. She recited to the school a poem taught her while a little girl by her mother. One of her granddaughters sang for her a hymn which expressed the feeling of her heart.

WESTERN YEARLY MEETING

Hinkle's Creek.—Martilia and Mary Cox, of Tangier, Indiana, commenced revival services at this place on the 22d of January, and continued three weeks, in all about thirty-five sessions. The pastor, Arthur Hendrickson, assisted them a part of the time. The gospel was preached very clearly and with the power of the Spirit. Our Church was planning for a series of meetings from another source, but we feel that the Lord led, and those sisters came to us very unexpectedly. Conviction seemed to be upon the people from the very first. There were conversions nearly every day. There were more than fifty that were definitely blessed by being converted, reclaimed or sanctified. A significant feature of the meeting was the number of heads of families that were saved: there being not less than twenty of them. Many were past the meridian of life and a number of them had never made a start before in the Christian life. We feel that it has been quite an uplift to our little Church. There will be twelve or fifteen applications for membership. The Cox sisters are now engaged in a revival at Providence, a church near to us.

Noblesville.—Noblesville has undergone a spiritual awakening during the last five weeks. Some months ago a scheme was launched whereby a simultaneous revival should be held at the First M. E., the Christian, and the Friends' Churches, and according to schedule each church set sail for a higher plane on the 4th of January. The organized effort proved a success from the very beginning, and as the work progressed it only showed that "in unity there is strength," and that church fellowship is a fortress behind which God's people can set the enemy to flight, and rescue those who have fallen captive to Satan's forces. The ministers did their preaching in their respective churches, and were assisted by singing evangelists, and throughout these meetings the power of God was manifest in both preaching and singing, and many souls were saved. On each Sabbath afternoon there was a Union Mass meeting for men and boys, and one for women and girls. These meetings were largely attended, and here men and women were made to realize that "the wages of sin is death."

Gertrude Reinier, our beloved pastor, with her strong, logical, evangelistic sermons coupled with her prayerful and devoted pastoral service, and aided by a large chorus of consecrated singers, and an orchestra tuned to sing God's praises, brought many souls under deep conviction and to know their Redeemer from sin. Her special message to the union men's meeting proved most effective and uplifting. In fact, her ministry in this city has been greatly blessed of God, and she has built up the Church she serves in members, zeal, fidelity and spiritual power; and today our Church is on a higher plane, spiritually, socially and financially.

One pleasing sight at a recent prayer meeting, since the close of these special revival services, was when Professor Wallthal and his Sunday-school class of young men led the meeting in a very effective manner, each taking some part aside from special vocal and instrumental music. At the close a few remarks were made by our pastor, and she extended an invitation to any who might want to change from living a worldly life to that of Christian service, and one young lady graciously accepted and was happily converted. Among those who gave helpful assistance to Mrs. Reinier during the meetings were Professor Harger, our choir director, and the Misses Leora Bogue and Leola King, of Fairmount, and also the "Gospel team" of four young men of Earlham College.

At our next Monthly Meeting there will be taken into full membership twenty or more persons, besides children. To see these only proves to us that God does hear and answer prayer, and today our Church has adopted Paul's words as our motto: "Go forward."

Plainfield.—Plainfield Quarterly Meeting of Western Yearly Meeting meets alternately at Indianapolis and Plainfield. The session of the 7th was held at Plainfield, the Quarterly Meeting and the Quarterly Meeting on Ministry and Oversight occurring the same date. There was a fair attendance, although it was a raw winter day. Asa E. Woodward and Jehu Reagan, visiting ministers, gave helpful discourse, Jehu Reagan's text being, "Ye are the salt of the earth." The thought was that God accomplishes the redemption of humanity through human agents, and if we, His professing children, are not wholly given over to His service, there is little savor in the salt. Jehu Reagan is Superintendent of the Department of Temperance and Prohibition of the liquor traffic for Western Yearly Meeting, and he followed up the sermon above mentioned with a helpful talk outlining proposed temperance work within our Yearly Meeting limits.

Plainfield Quarterly Meeting following up the action of Western Yearly Meeting at the session of 1913, is endeavoring to work out a plan for the better care of all church records and documents, there having been some slackness in the past in that direction. It is proposed to have a "custodian of records" and arrangements are to be made for safe deposit storage for church records, not in current use.

Our subject discussed during our recent Quarterly Meeting was, "How can we renew the interest of our members that have become 'occasionals,' and how acquire new members?" Who has the problem solved?

The following minute from our journal of proceedings is self explanatory. Our congregations are encouraged to observe Sabbath, March 1st, as "American Friend Day," as requested by The American Friend of February 5, 1914, page 82. The new Yearly Meeting house will probably be ready for use inside of sixty days.

Hopewell, Indiana.—Arthur Hammond of Carmel, Indiana, began a series of meetings at Hopewell, February 2d, and continued until the 17th of February. His messages were clear and forceful, edifying to the Church and convincing to the sinner. A number were saved and renewed, and six gave their names for membership. We are thankful to our Heavenly Father for sending Brother Hammond this way, and pray that God's richest blessings may be upon him in all his work. We believe the Church is in a much better condition to go forward with the work to which she is called than for some time.

EARLHAM GETS AN INCREASE

On Thursday, February 19, there was conveyed to Earlham College by deed, real estate situated in the city of Bedford, Indiana, the value of which is conservatively estimated at $65,000. Antoinette Fell, a maiden lady and a member of the Society of Friends, left her entire estate by will to her nephew, Moses F. Dunn, "for his use and comfort, with full power to control, dispose of, or sell the same or any part thereof, as if conveyed in fee simple," and Mr. Dunn is made sole executor of the will.

In her will, however, she expressed the hope that provision would be made for the above mentioned property, at the death of Mr. Dunn, to go to Earlham College for general educational purposes and that it constitute a fund to be known as the "Moses Fell Fund." Through the generosity of Mr. Dunn the deeds are made over at once to Earlham College. The property consists of the "Fell Block," of the home of Miss Fell, and of building lots in the city of Bedford.

In connection with this gift Mr. Dunn has established two annual scholarships of seventy-five dollars each, to be known as the "Fell-Dunn" scholarships, which are to go to persons designated by the superintendents of the high schools of Bedford and Mitchell, Lawrence County, the appointments to be approved by the President of Earlham College.

In her will Miss Fell provided also that two farms in Lawrence County, estimated in value at $65,000, be given by Mr. Dunn to Purdue University on condition that that institution establish on one of the farms an experiment station to be known as "The Moses Fell Annex of Purdue University," with the further provision that if Purdue fails to meet the conditions imposed, both tracts of land shall be conveyed in fee simple to Earlham College for general educational purposes.

The name of "Fell" is a noted one in the annals of the Society of Friends. The name is derived from the district of Furness Fells, the general name for High Furness in England. Many Fells joined Friends in England in the early history of the Society, and, as is well known, George Fox, the founder of the Society, married the widow of Judge Thomas Fell. Miss Antoinette Fell, Earlham's benefactor, was a woman of unusual culture and strength of mind and character. Moses F. Dunn, the joint benefactor, is an able and brilliant attorney, a highly educated man, and has traveled practically all over the world. His law office is a veritable art gallery and bespeaks the excellent taste of a man with world-wide sympathies. He is a fascinating conversationalist and a man of power.

The will of Miss Fell was written before the recent endowment campaign began and therefore there is no possibility of securing a pro rata payment from the General Education Board of New York on this gift.

FRIENDS' BIBLE SCHOOL BOARD

The Bible School Board of the Five Years Meeting and the P. W. Raida-baugh Publishing House are now united, and have their office at Fairmount, Indiana, where all kinds of Bible School supplies may be had.

Recently the Board sent out to all Friends' Bible Schools, as far as it was possible to reach them, order blanks for the second Quarter's supplies, asking that all supplies of all kinds be ordered through our office. We are prepared to furnish any article needed for the Bible School at Publishers' prices. We keep in stock a supply of Record Books, Charts, Class Envelopes, Cards, etc., and will gladly order any articles not kept in stock. By ordering through our office, you confer a financial favor upon the Board, and at the same time are advancing our own Denominational Bible School work.

The Board is now preparing and editing entirely new the Teacher's Quarterly, the Adult Quarterly (formerly the Advanced Quarterly), and the Lesson Sheets. The Teacher's Quarterly and the Lesson Sheets will sell at their former prices, but the Adult Quarterly will sell at 5 cents per copy or 4 cents in clubs, whereas it formerly sold at 5 cents single copy or 3¾ cents in clubs.

The Intermediate Quarterly is also edited by the Board and will be entirely new, much larger and much improved in many ways. It will sell at 5 cents per copy or 20 cents per year. The Child's Lesson Leaf and the Youth's Friend will be published for the present just as formerly. Before passing judgment on the new Quarterlies, we want Friends to examine them carefully, and then send any suggestions or criticisms to the Editors. Letters of inquiry in regard to the contents of any of the above publications should be addressed to Wilbur K. Thomas, 12 Hazelwood Street, Roxbury, Massachusetts, or Richard Hawthorth, Fairmount, Indiana.

Supplemental Reading

For supplementary reading, we offer in addition to the Youth's Friend, the Messenger of Peace, published monthly by the Peace Association of Friends in America, which is the Board of the Five Years Meeting on Peace and Arbitration. This periodical is now a sixteen page paper devoted to various phases of the peace question and including in each number one or more articles of special interest to young people and children. The subscription price is 25 cents per year for single copies to single addresses, or 20 cents per copy per year where ten or more go in one package to one address.

BIBLE SCHOOL LESSON

March 8.

Subject.—Watchfulness. (A Temperance Lesson.)

Lesson.—Luke 12: 35-48.

Golden Text.—Blessed are those servants whom the Lord, when he cometh, shall find watching.—Luke 12: 37.

Place.—Perea.

Time.—January A.D. 30.

Jesus is filling up the closing months of his life with those wonderful lessons that are the masterpieces of moral and religious teaching for all the ages. This is a lesson in fundamental duty; the duty of guarding zealously and with faithfulness that which has been committed to one's care. Standing at the citadel of every life, the heart and the conscience must be kept pure as the only guarantee of genuine success.

Every man is obligated to keep his brain clear, for the mind must direct the operations of his entire mechanism, yet drink means loss of self control, loss of will power, loss of reason ultimately. Statistics show an appalling amount of insanity through the use of intoxicants.

Every one is obligated to keep his heart pure and his conduct clean. No one can violate this rule without suffering the loss of that which is most essential in this life, no less than in the life to come. Drinking liquor and purity of heart and clean conduct cannot go hand in hand in this enlightened age.

The user of intoxicants lessens his efficiency, and can never be at his best. The railroads, manufacturers, employers of labor in every line are giving abundant testimony to this truth. Who wants a drunken engineer, a drunken mechanic, a drunken artisan, a drunken superintendent, a drunken clerk, a drunken foreman, a drunken lawyer, a drunken doctor? Who in fact, wants a drunken citizen? All business, all society, is on guard against the drunken man. Pass him on; nobody can use him. Yet we license men to make drunkards of other men, and then kick the fruitage aside as worthless in a progressive civilization. When will government learn to be on guard against the product of the saloon, to the extent that it will make it impossible longer for the drunkard making institutions to exist?

Economically the state needs to be on guard against the brewery, the distillery, and the bar room. Who ever knew a saloon that paid for itself? When the balance is struck between the debit and credit side of the ledger, America will learn—any nation will learn—that the liquor traffic is a liability and never an asset; a liability too heavy to be perpetuated. Crime, pauperism, insanity, inefficiency, delinquencies of every sort that are the products of the saloon, do more to keep the tax rate high than anything else.

No man ever expected to become a drunkard. It was in an unguarded moment that he took his first glass. It was through unwatchfulness that the habit grew upon him, until the robber drink became his master.

Drink destroys for all eternity. No other one sin so surely drives out hope and destroys faith and blackens character. The deadliest enemy of the Church is the saloon. The time has come for a Christian civilization to abolish the liquor traffic.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR

March 8.

Topic.—How to Prevent Poverty. Ps. 72: 1-19.

It might be well to define poverty. Not only does it mean the absence of the necessities of life, but there is poverty in spirit, poverty in mind, poverty in character.

Causes of Poverty

1. Improvidence.
2. Profligacy.
3. Oppression of wealth.
4. Wastefulness.
5. The Saloon and Vice.

Assign each number to someone in the Society to elaborate, either in a paper or a five minute talk.

Christianity, education, proper home training, the abolition of the saloon and vice will eradicate poverty. The relation of religion to the business side of life is direct and conclusive. Industry and frugality are Christian graces that ought to characterize the life of every home.

OPENING DAY AT PLAINFIELD

The Friends at Plainfield, Indiana, expect to go into their new meeting house March 8th. On the 28th of March, 1913, the old meeting house, which was built by Western Yearly Meeting in 1857, and which for more than half a century has accommodated the Friends of central Indiana and Eastern Illinois at their annual gatherings, and from whose walls had resounded the gospel message from noted ministers and evangelists, and at whose altars scores had sought and found Christ, was destroyed by fire. The walls however, had remained standing, and were found to be so intact as to be fit for use in the construction of the present new building; and now Western Yearly Meeting has a building which, for convenience and comfort cannot be surpassed by any of her sister yearly meetings.

A large basement with committee rooms, a rest room, dining-room and kitchen, is one of the splendid features, and must be seen to be appreciated. The local Friends, as before, have finished and furnished the west room for their own use, which of course, will be thrown open at Yearly Meeting time. The entire building will be dedicated next September, when the Yearly Meeting convenes.

Plainfield Monthly Meeting was established in Eighth Month, 1857, and for a time the meetings were held at Sugar Grove, two and a half miles south of this place, but later were in a little frame building which stood on the site of the present Baptist church, afterwards moving to the yearly meeting house. During the past year, the Sabbath services have been held in the Academy building. The services on the opening day will be in charge of Willard O. Trueblood, pastor of First Friends' Church, Indianapolis, assisted by E. Jas. Carter, pastor of the Plainfield church.

LYNNVILLE, IOWA.

DEAR FRIEND—Allow me to express my appreciation of The American Friend as we have had it the past year; it has certainly met the need in a most commendable way. Especially have I enjoyed the editorial matter which has been running in more recent issues. One of the most deplorable things in connection with it is the fact that so many should fail in the matter of whole-hearted support of the effort of the Church to serve them. With a most hearty endorsement of the policy which has been followed in the management of the paper, I am

Most sincerely,
ZENO H. DOAN.

AFRAID TO EAT

Girl Starving on Poorly Selected Food

"Several years ago I was actually starving," writes a Me. girl, "yet dared not eat for fear of the consequences.

"I had suffered indigestion from overwork, irregular meals and improper food, until at last my stomach became so weak I could eat scarcely any food without great distress.

"Many kinds of food were tried, all with the same discouraging effects. I steadily lost health and strength until I was but a wreck of my former self.

"Having heard of Grape-Nuts and its great merits, I purchased a package, but with little hope that it would help me—I was so discouraged.

"I found it not only appetizing but that I could eat it as I liked and that it satisfied the craving for food without causing distress, and if I may use the expression, "it filled the bill."

"For months Grape-Nuts was my principal article of diet. I felt from the very first that I had found the right way to health and happiness, and my anticipations were fully realized.

"With its continued use I regained my usual health and strength. Today I am well and can eat anything I like, yet Grape-Nuts food forms a part of my bill of fare."

The Principle of the Self-Regulator

in the

"FARQUAR" SANITARY HEATING SYSTEM

is simplicity itself.

Expansion and contraction of the fire-box itself controls the lever which opens and closes the draft door. Expansion throws the lower end of the lever out from the furnace. The gravity door which engages the lever is consequently opened. Contraction draws the lever toward the furnace, permitting the gravity door to follow, thus reducing the draft. The fire is controlled by itself. This is an interesting discovery and use of the laws of nature, which are fully explained in our catalogue free for the asking.

Died

Bales.—James C. Bales was born near Raytown, Tennessee, October 8, 1835, and died at his home at Prairie Center near Eudora, Kansas, February 7, 1914. He was converted in youth and held fast his faith to the end. He was a birthright Friend, and at the time of his death, a member of Prairie Center Monthly Meeting. He was honest in his dealings, and when able, faithful in his attendance at public worship. He is survived by his wife and four children.

Cox.—Levi Cox, son of Thomas and Sarah Barker Cox, was born March 12, 1831, and died at his home near Ramsun, North Carolina, December 6, 1913. He was a life long member of Holly Spring Meeting of Friends. He was converted in early manhood, and soon after received a call to the ministry, which was acknowledged in 1871. He faithfully applied himself to this work as long as health would permit. He was married in 1855 to Patience Parker, who died in 1898. Their home was a place of rest and enjoyment to many traveling Friends, and while his wife lived they visited a number of Yearly Meetings. In 1905 he married Rebecca Willett who still survives him. He was a real stay in his home meeting and a loyal member of the Yearly Meeting. During his final sickness he was an example of meekness and submission to the will of the Master. He is survived by the widow and four daughters.

Hawkes.—Mary Collins Hawkes died at Worcester, Massachusetts, February 8, 1914, in her eighty-ninth year. She was a woman of beautiful Christian character, a beloved member, and for many years an elder of Winthrop Monthly Meeting, Maine. Funeral services were held in the Friends' meeting house at Worcester and at Manchester, Maine.

J. Keys arrived in the country 5 years ago from Denmark with very little means. He homesteaded, worked hard, is now the owner of 320 acres of land, in 1913 had a crop of 200 acres, which will realize him about $4,000. His wheat weighed 68 lbs. to the bushel and averaged over 35 bushels to the acre.

Thousands of similar instances might be related of the homesteaders in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

The crop of 1913 was an abundant one everywhere in Western Canada.

FRIENDS IN COPENHAGEN

Copenhagen Friends a year ago tried the experiment of holding their meetings in a public room, with announcements in local papers. After the earlier weeks, when the attendance was for a time substantially increased, the numbers have shrunk again to the normal. It is supposed that the temporary enlargement was due to the hope of other small congregations of earnest dissenters of drawing Friends to unite with them; and in the case of one small group the temptation of "loaves and fishes." English Friends visiting Denmark are earnestly invited to inform themselves about meetings in that country; Danish Friends greatly appreciate the few visits they receive from English Friends.—From The Friend (London).

The Seal'd Book

BY WM. JOSEPH JONES

This moment ends it all. The year has gone,
 Daylight has hidden in the dark of night,
 The Horologue of Time is striking twelve.
 And I am all alone. No, not alone,
 Conscience is here, and memory is here,
 And God is here, as, in the dim firelight,
 I sit and meditate. Awe steals o'er me;
 A spirit presence moves about the room,
 Perhaps, the ghost of time, time that is past,
 And is not time, but vast eternity.
 Before me is a book shut up and seal'd;
 I cannot open it, and if I could,
 I would not dare to read it, for that is me,
 And who can look upon his deeds and thoughts,
 The record written by himself? My hand
 Penn'd the words, and made each one immortal,
 And then God's holy angel closed the book,
 And seal'd it with a seal no man can break.
 This volume is but one of many more,
 Guarded, by sleepless vigilance, somewhere
 Beyond the border line of finite life,
 Some day the knell of time will sound aloud,
 Those living in the world will hear and know,
 Earth and ocean will yield their countless dead,
 And the great final day will then have come.
 The Lord of Hosts will be the Judge of men,
 And break the seals and read from ev'ry book.
 None will then deny. He who hated truth,
 And sinn'd and lied, and sinn'd and lied again,
 That day will tell the truth, and all the truth,
 For there in Memory's book is written
 The record, in his own chirography.
 But some are sprinkled with the blood of Christ,
 On ev'ry page is stamp'd a blessed name.
 The sins of word and thought and deed are hid
 Beneath the crimson spots, and only things,
 Approv'd of God, can there be plainly read.
 Oh! dearest Lord, will one of these be mine?

Crozet, Virginia.

Observing "American Friend Day"

We would suggest that any meeting that found it impossible to observe "AMERICAN FRIEND DAY" last Sabbath, set apart next Sabbath for its observance. We feel that the same obligation is upon every meeting, and there is no reason why one meeting should give attention to this subject and another ignore it. The Friends of America are face to face with the problem of whether they will maintain their own periodical, or whether they will permit diversified interests to so divide their patronage as to prevent solidarity of action in the direction of their own organ.

The Man of a Book

Dwight L. Moody and his Bible were inseparable. No man of his century did so much by example and teaching to revive Bible study as he did. He had a large, choice library, but the Bible was his one book. For a number of years he made it a rule not to read any book that did not help him to understand the Bible. He said he was "a greater slave to that book than any man is to strong drink." He believed, as he wrote on the title-page of his Bible, "This Book will keep you from sin, or sin will keep you from this Book."

Mr. Moody confidently declared that he had hope of the worst man as long as he would read his Bible, feeling sure that he would turn to God some day. But, he said: "I am full of fear for the best man if he neglects his Bible. He is almost certain to fall before the enemy. Amid these last days' perils there is no safeguard but in the Word of God."

We believe, as a certain writer declares, that "the most strategic thing a pastor can do is to persuade his congregation to read the Bible;" that "a Bible-reading congregation is ready for every good word and work;" and that to enlist an entire community in Bible reading and Bible study "would be better than a revival." Indeed, that would be a revival!—Selected.

Protecting Widows in India

At the Half Year Meeting of the Society of Friends in India, held before the Christian Mela at Makoriya in January last, the need for a Widows' Home, or of some other arrangement for the protection of young Christian widows, and of a training by which they could support themselves, was brought forward by one of the Indian members. After some discussion a mixed committee of Indians and English missionaries was appointed to make further inquiries, and bring in suggestions, if it was still felt to be a necessity. In the informal preliminary meeting of that committee it was felt that, though such a Home might be under the management of a Hindustani matron, there should be an English missionary lady at the head. The scarcity of "Miss Sahibs" in India was commented on, and the need for more was emphasized by both Indians and English on the Committee, in view of the work in school, zenana and Christian communities waiting to be done.—London Friend.

A Quaker Meeting In a Cathedral

The first Quaker Meeting to be held in St. Paul's Cathedral, Boston, occurred on the evening of First Month 29th, at eight o'clock. About twenty-five Friends, of three "branches," five clergymen, four lay members of the Episcopal Church sat down in quiet to worship together. There was perhaps a half hour of silence—a living silence in which the hidden oneness of our spirits came clearer to our inner vision. This consciousness was voiced by a Friend who showed that there is a unity of all souls seeking truth and keener consciousness of God, far deeper and more valuable than unity of opinion. After a few more words and another unifying silence we went to our homes feeling that the eternal part of our beings had been actually strengthened.—ELEANOR DENSMORE WOOD in The Friend.

Last year 359,385 new members were added to the Methodist Episcopal Church. That is an average of 22 to every Methodist minister.

Hungering After Righteousness

The yearning of the human heart after truth is an age-long craving that has found satisfaction only in the personality of Jesus Christ and the gospel which he came to earth to proclaim. The heathen philosophers readily recognized a realm of thought and action which they could not penetrate, and we find Plato proclaiming: "We will wait for one, be it a god or a god-inspired man, to teach us our religious duties, and take away the darkness from our eyes." Even the stoics revealed the uncertainty of their philosophy by their efforts to establish tranquility of spirit as against a natural unrest of the human mind which they were compelled to admit.

We find a Roman philosopher, clamorous for a vision to which his eyes were blinded, exclaiming: "Oh, if one only might have a guide to truth." It is the universal cry of every sincere soul in all the ages. Every doubt only proclaims an unsatisfied hunger. Skepticism itself makes no claim to satisfaction in its pronouncements of unbelief. It allays no thirst for genuine truth. In man's saner moments, when he is shut in with his own consciousness, he must admit to himself a longing that will not be stilled to know the verities of human life, to have an experience that will satisfy the hunger of the soul, to be able to see if only by the eye of faith the light from some celestial world illuminating the dark background of the unknown and revealing truths that will meet to the uttermost every human need.

Soul hunger is not measured by the centuries. Whether it be the patriarchs looking for a light down the ages, or the Psalmist panting after God, or the prophets looking with seeing eyes into the future and yearning that their people might catch the same vision of a crucified Christ that was to be; whether it be the ancient philosophers straining their faith to get a glimpse of the unknown, or the reformers of mediæval times breaking through the environs of custom and dead traditions in order that they might find peace; whether it be a George Fox who for months walked the highways of life seeking quietude of spirit, or the modern man of affairs seeking an answer to the great questions of life that persist in intruding themselves into his inner consciousness; whether it be the modern scholar critical in his examination and searching after truth as with a lighted candle, or the young man heavy with budding responsibility who hardly knows which road to take, all alike have found succor and deliverance as they have turned their steps to Calvary and there read the story of the matchless and abounding love of God, who could sacrifice his only Son for the redemption of a world that is hopelessly groping in darkness without a Savior.

Man's extremity has ever been God's opportunity. The hungry soul that finds sustenance nowhere else will always find it in Jesus Christ. "Blessed are they who hunger and thirst after righteousness." Blessed indeed are they, for the promise is that "they shall be filled." There could be no other answer to the pitiful cry that for centuries pierced the heavens with a yearning after truth, than that the Son of God should come to earth that he might be bruised for the world's iniquities; and there can be no other answer today to the pitiful cry of a sinful world for help or a doubting world for light, than that Jesus Christ will reveal Himself by the Holy Spirit to the consciousness of every soul that will diligently seek Him with a whole heart.

Hunger is the outgrowth of a conscious need, or it may be generated by beholding satisfaction in others. He who enthrones Jesus Christ in his life will get a desire for the same experience in other lives. No other religion, no system of philosophy, no interpretations of psychology, no code of ethics, no standard of morals will satisfy the soul that is hungry for help. There is a mighty cloud of witnesses who can rise up and testify that "My thirst was quenched, my soul revived,

And now I live in Him."

The Every-Member Canvass

With the coming of March has come the climax of a year's activities by the Laymen's Missionary movement in behalf of all the Protestant Churches, in the interests of a larger support for the Church, primarily in missions, both home and foreign; but in reality in every department, including that of current expenses. No other denomination probably has as much to gain from this great plan as does the Society of Friends.

The every-member canvass for church support has worked well wherever it has been tried. The interest begotten by a personal call upon every member in behalf of a larger co-operation in the work of the Church is of itself a benefit of no insignificant proportions, and that same interest almost invariably prompts a larger and more stable support for all the work of the Church.

We have heard of one or two meetings among Friends where the every-member canvass has brought gratifying results. It is to be hoped that many others will try the plan this year, according to the methods which have been set forth from time to time in THE AMERICAN FRIEND. We believe that the Church Boards and Committees are not likely to find adequate support by any other method. During this month, the canvass will be going on in many of the denominations and Friends will find there is value and inspiration in simultaneous work.

The Place of Quaker History in General Church History

BY ELBERT RUSSELL

III. "The Logical Conclusion of the Protestant Reformation."

We have seen how Luther's position substituted an inward for an outward religious authority. Logically it left no place for any church authority but that granted by the convictions and free consent of church members. This logical outcome was, however, not at once attained. It was too great a step from papal absolutism to free individualism. The struggle to realize the individual freedom implied in Protestantism and to reconstruct the church and society on the basis of its principles is the key to modern history.

While Luther claimed the right of private judgment for himself, he drew back when his essentially conservative nature faced its first disintegrating consequences. The Zwickau prophets refused to be guided by Luther's conscience, and Zwingli did not interpret the Scriptures about the Lord's Supper as Luther did. The Peasant's wars broke out and the fanaticism of the Anabaptists of Münster produced religious and political disorders. The practice of private judgment threatened to destroy completely the social and ecclesiastical order. The men of that age still felt that the feudal state was a divine institution and were unable to conceive of salvation apart from the church and its sacraments. We need not wonder, then, that Luther was willing to make sacrifices of principle and other men's liberties in the effort to preserve church and state. He himself had rejected the authority of the Catholic Church, and could not turn back to it without going contrary to his own conscience. Consequently he turned to the princes of Germany and called upon them to assemble synods which should define doctrine, prescribe forms of worship and establish church organization, and to compel their subjects to conform to them.

Substantially the same inconsistency marked the course of the other great Protestant leaders. Each claimed the right to follow his own "inner light," but denied that right to others when the exercise of it led to divergent results. Calvin built up his great system of doctrine and church organization on the basis of his own interpretation of the Scriptures. By his own relentless logic he produced a theological system based on the incapacity of the non-elect to know or judge of religious matters. To be sure, he claimed that the Bible as interpreted by the Spirit was the ultimate authority, but in practice that meant the Bible as understood by himself. He would not trust other men's leading, and he used the power of the state in Geneva to burn Servetus, when the latter refused to forego his own interpretation of the Scriptures and take Calvin's instead.

The same inconsistency, the same vacillation between outward and inward authority, characterizes the Protestant attitude toward the Bible. The first reformers—Luther, Calvin and Zwingli—were quite conscious that the Bible as a collection of Jewish and Christian religious books—just those in the Protestant canon and no more—had back of it the authority of the Roman Church. It was Augustine of Hippo who first got a church council to define the limits of the inspired collection, limiting the inspired books to the present canon. Luther knew that he must find some other ground for asserting the authority of the Bible, since he had rejected the authority of the Church. He could not build on its authority until he had re-established that authority. Luther laid down as his own judgment that those books were inspired and therefore authoritative which spoke of Christ. He criticised the Catholic canon freely, had little regard for Esther, and wished to eliminate the Epistle of James as "an epistle of straw, having nothing evangelical in it." Calvin made the witness of the Spirit the evidence and proof of the inspiration of the books of the Bible, but it is to be noted that it was the witness of the Spirit to himself and those who shared his views. In both cases the authority of Scripture and the list of books composing it was made to rest upon a private judgment according to a self-chosen principle. But no such liberty was allowed their fellow Christians. The right of private judgment was ultimately denied. The authority of the state was substituted for the authority of the church. Scripture was authoritatively defined in the Protestant canon, authoritatively interpreted in the creed, and in the churches of Germany, Switzerland, Geneva, England and Scotland assent was enforced by the government.

The cause of this inconsistency in Protestantism was the lingering influence upon the minds of the reformers of the Medieval conception of God and His relation to the world. The idea of God is the determining idea in religious thought and it is always the natural corollary of men's estimate of the worth and capabilities of man. Before Augustine's time there had grown up in the church a feeling that God was far removed from the world. This belief sprang naturally from the early Christians' sense of the pagan origin and character of the politics, learning and amusements of the Roman world. The nature gods of the Greeks became in Christian thought demons controlling the world. God must seem far removed from a world in which His will and character are so little realized. This feeling was emphasized in the third and fourth centuries by the increasing poverty of the empire, by the sterility of the soil, by a succession of calamities—flood, earthquake and famine,—by the growing idea of the evil of matter and the spread of monasticism, by the sinking of the masses into slavery, and the cessation of most citizens from the vigorous and ennobling activities of labor and citizenship. These things lowered the common estimate of the worth of man. They could not see God's image in humanity nor think of His nearness to such a world. The belief grew strong that only by miracle or by special revelation to men supernaturally endowed—chiefly in the nobler past—could or did God make Himself known to man so depraved. Augustine formulated this attitude of his generation into the doctrine of human depravity. The crude paganism of the northern barbarians, who overran the empire, and their native incapacity for Christian ideals made the doctrine acceptable to Medieval Europe. As we have just seen, the belief in the transcendence of God, who can be approached by depraved mankind only through mediators or made known to them only through special revelation, was the natural accompaniment of this doctrine. Accordingly, the Catholic system bridged over this chasm between God and man by means of the mediation of priests, saints, angels and the Virgin Mary. The church claimed that to its exclusive keeping had been committed the revelation made through the prophets, the Christ and the apostles. It also had been entrusted with the sacraments and other means of grace through which alone men could experience the Divine mercy and come into Communion with Christ.

Now both Luther and Calvin broke away from this Medieval system in large measure. Both believed that prayer could be offered directly to God. Both believed in justification by faith as a personal experience, in the gift of the Holy Spirit to the believer or the elect, and in the priesthood of believers in a limited sense. But Luther was an Augustinian monk and never escaped from Augustine's notion of the depravity of man, and Calvin elevated the consequences of man's depravity into an eternal decree of God for the damnation of most of the human race. All the reformers lacked the full New Testament idea of the Fatherly nearness and approachableness of God. Consequently they retained certain priestly functions for the ministry, and continued two of the seven sacraments of the Medieval church as essential to full participation in God's grace and fellowship. For the celebration of these sacraments a church organization and some form of ordained priesthood were necessary. Luther especially held extremely high notions of the nature and efficacy of the Lord's Supper.

Under these conditions Luther could not conceive of a full realization of even personal salvation, to say nothing of public worship, without the church. When, therefore, the exercise of private judgment by others seemed to involve the complete disintegration of the church, Luther drew back. He dared not trust other men's reason and conscience when sobered by responsibility and corrected by education and experience, to lead men freely to common perceptions of essential truth and to form the basis of a new organization of the church. Neither he nor Calvin had a sense, of God as so imminent in the world and the soul, of His Spirit as so real in men's experience, of the unforced spiritual influence of the historic Christ and the Bible as so convincing, that these would draw men together again into working unity of religious belief and into co-operation in worship and work in the absence of outward authority. Because they believed so onesidedly in the transcendence of God and in the depravity of man, the great leaders of the Reformation could see no hope of a church except in a forcible limitation of other men's liberty or belief. And because a church was necessary to salvation, they turned to the state to maintain one by external compulsion.

Because of this inconsistency Protestantism has never been at peace. Its history has been the story of oppression, persecution and religious ostracism on the one hand, and of dissent, division, criticism, sectarianism and rebellion on the other. The extrication of Protestantism from this inconsistency is, as has been stated above, the key to modern Protestant history. Its goals have been the recognition of the inwardness and freedom of Christianity and the reconstruction of church and state as social democracies. Toward this result many movements have conspired. The rationalist criticism of the Eighteenth Century compelled theology to justify itself before the bar of reason. The French Revolution destroyed the claims of autocratic government to rule by divine right, independent of the consent of the governed. Modern democracy in the state created a demand for democracy in the church. The era of toleration put an end to religious persecution. The Pietist, Wesleyan and "Low Church" movements appealed to personal experience in proof of the reality of religious truth rather than to external authority. The multiplication of religious sects promoted religious discussion. Scientific discovery enlarged the universe in time and space until it would not rest on the old dogmatic conceptions. Modern philosophy, historical criticism, and the theory of evolution liberated men's minds from all the old dogmas that have not been able to justify themselves to the modern mind. Along with these movements there has been a reconstruction of religious organizations and activities on a basis of voluntary co-operation and of religious beliefs on the basis of common experience and free discussion. In the great interdenominational movements of the last few decades, and in the great struggle for church union and federation which marks our own day we are beginning to see the reconstruction of the church upon the logical basis of Protestantism in a grander and freer unity than Christendom has ever known.

For Protestantism in general, this process is not yet completed, but its goal was reached in the latter half of the seventeenth century by the founders of the Society of Friends. The fact is well stated by Professor James: "So far as our Christian sects today are evolving into liberality, they are simply reverting in essence to the position which Fox and the early Quakers so long ago assumed" (varieties of Religious Experience). Quakerism was the logical conclusion of the Reformation. The first reformers failed to reach that conclusion because of their inherited lack of faith in their own principle to furnish a basis for a reconstructed Christendom; because they could not feel in the inward authority to which they appealed the presence and working of God. The early Friends were the first to escape sufficiently from the Medieval ideas of the depravity of man and the aloofness of God to reach the logical implications of the Reformation: inward authority, God imminent in the soul, salvation without ecclesiastical mediation, the church as a free society without external bond or test.

It must not be forgotten that George Fox was not distinguished from the other great reformers in that he found his Authority and Guide within, and claimed for himself the right to follow the leadings of his "Inward Light." Luther, Zwingli and Calvin had done the same in some fashion. The revolutionary thing about Quakerism was that its leaders granted all men the same right, and undertook to reorganize Christianity, without appeal to external authority or force, simply upon the free co-operation of individuals following the same Inward Light, hearkening to the same Christ. The logical conclusion of Protestantism was thus seen to be, not a pure religious individualism, but a religious and social democracy. Without sacrificing individual freedom, they attained religious union and co-operation, by recognizing that the individual never reaches his truest knowledge and best service except in co-operation with others. Barclay gave this truth classical expression in his "Apology": "As many candles lighted, and put in one place, do greatly augment the light, and make it more to shine forth, so when many are gathered together into the same life, there is more of the glory of God, and His power appears to the refreshment of each individual; for that he partakes not only of the light and life raised in himself, but in all the rest."

January Mission Conferences

BY CHARLES E. TEBBETTS

At the invitation of the Dean of the Kennedy School of Missions, I went pretty directly from the Kansas City Student Volunteer Convention to Hartford, for a brief visit of inspection. The Kennedy School of Missions is connected with Hartford Theological Seminary. We have had fifteen young Friends there this year, and I found it a most delightful group, thoroughly loyal to Friends, and prayerfully studying how to make their lives count for the most for our own work. They meet each week and hold a meeting after the good order of Friends. It was a great pleasure to be at one of these meetings, and feel the splendid spirit of fellowship and the reality of the divine presence. Friends are made very welcome at this institution, and there is no attempt to proselyte them away from us. There is no better place for the thorough preparation of young people who are looking toward the work of the ministry. The financial problem here is made easy for any worthy student desiring to attend.

The School of Missions is one of the two or three in this country that are equipped for thorough work. Probably there is no better anywhere. No expense is spared to provide everything essential to the best preparation for any of the mission fields. A visit to the phonetic laboratory revealed the most approved methods for acquiring precise enunciation of the sounds used in any language, simplifying the process of learning any language thoroughly. The library, classified according to the languages of various fields, and providing the material that a missionary to any field needs to come in touch with, is a most valuable asset for missionary preparation. It would be most helpful if all our candidates for the mission field could take at least a year of preparation at the Kennedy School of Missions.

On Sunday, January 11th, by prearrangement, many of the Board Secretaries met in New York for sessions of earnest intercession for the world work. Three sessions were held. The need of intercessory prayer is more and more felt by all those who realize the unparalleled opportunity now open to the Church and demanding the moving forward under divine leadership and power. There is much of silent prayer in these gatherings, and God seems wonderfully near in them.

Monday and Tuesday, January 12-13, were given to a Conference on Co-operation and the Promotion of Unity in Foreign Missionary Work. The Presbyterian Foreign Mission Assembly Room was filled at the four day sessions. An hour of united intercessory prayer opened the meeting. A valuable survey of present conditions under the four heads of Evangelistic, Educational, and Medical Work, and Distribution of Forces occupied two hours. In these departments union is already fully accomplished on the mission field. This is true even in theological instruction. An hour and a half was given to the discussion of Theological and Ecclesiastical Limitations and Practical Difficulties. The great obstacles to union were candidly discussed, with an increasing feeling that, though the difficulties are great, some way must be found under the leadership of the Spirit of God to overcome them. There must be no loss of personal convictions, and no real compromise along that line. But personal convictions must not stand in the way of Christian fellowship, and absolute co-operation in the great task of making Christ known to the whole world.

An evening session at a supper was devoted to two addresses; one by Prof. Johannes Warneck, D.D., of Germany, on "Experience of the German Missionary Societies in Co-operative Effort," and one by John R. Mott, L.L.D., on "The Work of the Continuation Committee." The latter set forth the splendid record of what that most important committee is accomplishing in leading the entire Protestant Church to face the whole task, and to prepare the way for its accomplishment by a thorough study of all the factors that enter into its solution. In a quiet way the greatest results are being realized in getting ready for an advance movement that means the actual reaching of the entire world with the Gospel message, and placing Christianity at the foundation of every department of human interest, governmental, social, and religious.

The subjects Tuesday morning were: 1. Interdenominational Agencies. 2. Relation of Western Theological Statements and Forms of Religious Experience to Other Races. 3. Attitude of Churches in the Mission Field toward the Denominational Divisions of the West. And 4. Growing Conviction that the Task of Evangelizing the World Requires the Effort of a United Church. This session was intensely interesting. There is absolute agreement that we have no right to perpetuate our western divisions on the mission field. It would be a folly and a crime. The Chinese will not tolerate it. The discussion brought out a strong feeling that we have about reached the point when we must do more than talk about co-operation and union here at home; when we are distinctly seeing that our divisions are standing squarely across the pathway to world conquest.

At the afternoon session the following subjects were presented: 1. The Teaching and Spirit of our Lord. 2. Prayers for Unity of Increasing Numbers of the People of God in All Communion. 3. Fundamental Truths Held in Common. 4. Growth of the Spirit of Unity at Home, (a) Among Men; (b) Among Women. This discussion showed how powerfully our Lord is leading His Church into sympathy with His Intercessory Prayer (John XVII.). It was a wonderful session. It closed with a half hour of Outlook and Consecration.

The speakers upon the program include the names of the best known leaders of North America, and one from Germany. The conference must have a profound influence in shaping the future history of the Church.

(The papers and discussion will be issued in a report. Any one desiring it may obtain it by sending 25 cents to the writer. It will be issued as soon as possible, but those desiring it must send for it at once as the number printed will be limited by the number applying for it.)

was held at Garden City Hotel from Wednesday morning to Friday noon. Sixty-seven Boards and Missionary organizations are represented in this organization. The days are filled with delightful fellowship, and the discussions are with the most delightful harmony and enthusiasm. The subjects presented were as follows: "The underlying motives which experience has shown to be the most powerful in appeals for funds and volunteers"; "Laymen as missionaries, their increasing supply, and places for them"; "Report of Board of Missionary Preparation"; "The correlation and balance of educational and evangelistic work abroad"; "The salaries of native workers in relation to self-support"; "The inter-relation of spiritual awakenings at home and abroad." Reports of committees on Anglo-American Communities; on Home Base; on Efficiency, and Committee of Reference and Counsel. These reports show the exceedingly valuable work done during the year by these standing committees. Space will not permit any detailed account of this work in this article. Everything is given in full in the Annual Report (25 cents). The progress of the work during the year in so far as it depends upon the churches in America, is fully outlined. The report is exceedingly valuable for those who wish to keep in touch with developments in missionary administration.

The last session was largely given to John R. Mott to report the splendid work done in the series of missionary conferences held this last year in India, China, Japan and Korea, under the auspices of the Continuation Committee. It was a masterpiece of missionary statesmanship, the most far-reaching of anything ever attempted in the records of missionary history. It is impossible to give any adequate account of it here. The character of the audience and the clearcut statement of the work accomplished made it exceedingly impressive. At the close he outlined the following lines of co-operative work that are absolutely essential in the immediate future:

1. In a comprehensive survey of the present missionary situation in the whole world. The facts to be thus obtained are absolutely essential.

2. To determine what "occupation of a field" really means. At present there are no standards. All is confusion. We must have a definite goal to work to.

3. As to what fields are totally unoccupied. It is a shame to the Christian Church that after 1,900 years we have to speak of unoccupied fields. Christendom needs to know the facts.

4. To lead out an adequate army of native leaders. The student movement on the mission field is wonderfully preparing the way for such leadership.

(The February number of the Missionary Review of the World has in full Mr. Mott's address at Kansas City, giving the account of the very remarkable series of Student Conferences held in the Orient by himself and Mr. Eddy in connection with his recent trip through the east. Every one should read it. It will open eyes to the present unparalleled situation.)

5. The better training of the choicest native leaders, to make possible great leadership of the Pauline type.

6. To develop the very best methods of evangelization. This should be the best in the world, and free from false and ill-advised methods. Whole nations are now open to evangelization on a national scale.

7. To give the organizing native church the best experience of the Christian centuries for right organization.

8. To help anchor native Christianity to historic and vital Christianity. There is danger of the native church getting adrift unless this is done.

9. To vitalize the native church. To emphasize a vital Christianity, rather than a merely formal church.

10. To determine upon an educational policy for mission lands. No good policy has yet been worked out.

11. To train native educational leaders.

12. To rightly guide the present tendency toward union in educational work. Nearly all the institutions in China have become union institutions in the last five years. This movement needs careful guidance through the combined wisdom of the whole church.

13. Union in Medical Missions and Medical Colleges on the mission field. The opportunity of training the future physicians of China and some other lands upon a Christian foundation is now possible and is of vast significance for Christianizing the whole nation. In a very few years this opportunity will be gone forever.

14. Union in publishing interests, and the putting out of a Christian literature of the highest type. This is especially important in view of the flooding of the Orient with pernicious and rationalistic literature.

15. Co-operation in co-operation. The present tendency toward a united Church needs most prayerful and intelligent guidance that no mistakes be made.

16. Co-operation in placing the spiritual emphasis. We need the highest spiritual experience in this crucial hour. The best of the whole Church should be dedicated to this high service. Inexhaustible depths of superhuman wisdom, love and power must be realized by the Church, and made available for the lands rising out of darkness into the light of His truth. Above all for this purpose a multiplied number of intercessors must be developed within the Church.

As one listened to this statemanslike presentation he felt that we were in the presence of vast spiritual forces that God is about to let loose upon His Church if it will only rise to His plans. We should be exceedingly thankful for the leaders He is giving us for just such a time as this. Will the Church follow as He leads? Will the Friends Church be found alive to such possibilities? Or will our "candlestick be removed out of its place?"

A Monthly Meeting Chronicle

BY JUNIUS JUNIOR

VIII.

August had now come with its protracted heat, but the progressive spirit was still working among the members of Slow Valley Meeting. Several of the congregation were away on their annual summer vacation, but nearly half the resident members were in their places when the gathered company sat down for the customary season of worship.

In the absence of the pastor, the resident minister led in the vocal exercises, and there were a number of testimonies and expressions of thankfulness for the way in which the Lord was leading the congregation out of the wilderness into a new life and into new relationships.

There were signs of a revival breaking out in mid-summer, and there were those ready to testify that it had already begun. The spirit of manifested interest in the whole meeting and in the entire neighborhood was beginning to produce its natural effect. Yet the meeting still had far to go before it could have the freedom to fill up its full measure of usefulness in Newtown and vicinity.

At the business session the Chairman of the Bible School Committee said that with the prospect of a larger attendance in the early autumn, more chairs would have to be secured for the Sabbath School room, and intimated that the time was coming soon when an addition ought to be made to the meeting house in order to care properly for the primary department. The question of the chairs was referred back to the Committee with power to act, although two of the men, true to their habits of long standing, cautioned the Committee against running the meeting into debt; in reply to which our farmer friend could not forbear saying that if the meeting next month would adopt the proposed financial plan which was pending, there would soon be an income sufficient to buy chairs and do a good many other necessary things without continually feeling the pinch of poverty. The question of an addition to the meeting house was not even considered.

Three delegates were appointed to the Quarterly Meeting, and it was a matter of remark for some days afterward, that one of them was a young woman who had been teaching in a neighboring town. For ten years, the Minutes had not shown the appointment of a young person as a delegate to the higher body. The report of the state of the Church to be forwarded to the Quarterly Meeting was full of hope and expressed the belief that Slow Valley Meeting was growing in the spiritual life. A communication from the mission in the foreign quarter of Newtown, renewed the request for help in that important work, and expressed the hope that with the coming of the autumn, the Christian forces of the city might unite in taking full charge of this missionary enterprise, which could not be maintained longer without a larger co-operation.

Two or three questioned the ability of the Monthly Meeting to do anything in this direction, while others said they had all they could do apparently to keep their own members true to their Church obligations. Finally, a grocer who had a small business adjoining the foreign quarter, made a timid plea that something be done, and said that God seemed to be sending the heathen right to their own doors to test the sincerity of their missionary professions. Others voiced the same feeling, and finally the Committee on the relationship of the meeting to the community was instructed to investigate the foreign problem in the city and report at the next meeting.

The Committee on invitation and welcome reported that plans were being laid to secure if possible, the attendance of every resident member at the first Sabbath morning service in September, which was to be a rally day both for the meeting and Sabbath School. Invitations were being given also to a number of families that had had some connections with Friends or were believed to be sympathetic with Friends, asking that they be present on that day. In answer to the question as to how these invitations were being given, the Chairman replied that in most instances they were being extended by personal visitations, and that each member of the Committee had obligated himself to look after certain families and to see that each of these families was visited in a social and friendly way by other members of the meeting.

The Committee on the internal relations of the meeting reported that two conferences had been held with several of the young people, and recommended that with the beginning of September, the Society of Christian Endeavor be reorganized, in harmony with the plan of the Yearly Meeting Christian Endeavor Union, and that in connection therewith a study class be organized to consider Friends' history, principles and doctrines to be followed later by a study of the application of Friends' principles to the needs of the present age. This part of the report led to a lively discussion, and considerable opposition developed, which was later mollified somewhat by the plea of some half dozen of the young people, who joined in the debate with an earnestness that was new in Slow Valley Monthly Meeting. The report was finally adopted, and a Committee was named to see that the organization was effected.

The Committee on the relationship of the meeting to the community reported progress in the matter of studying conditions, and gave the startling information that fully sixty-two per cent. of the families of Newtown and the surrounding territory, were not in the habit of attending church services, although this per cent. had been slightly reduced in recent weeks by the increased attendance at Friends' meeting. The Committee deplored the fact that the social life of the community centered in circles that were largely irreligious, and said that the time had evidently come when Christianity ought to become the ruling principle in the business and professional life of the city. Thus far the Committee had largely concerned itself with a study of the facts with which they had to deal, although some suggestions of a constructive nature were being considered which they hoped to report soon in definite form for the action of the Monthly Meeting.

A running discussion followed that was not altogether promising, the opinion being reiterated by some that Friends should expend their energies in keeping up their own meeting to the highest point of efficiency, although some of these same persons had been the most strenuous a few months before in opposing the efforts that had later resulted in building up the congregation and infusing new life into the members. Others had a vision of greater things for Slow Valley Meeting in the life of the community, while a few hoped the day would come soon when the four churches of the city would come to some kind of agreement about the task of building up the religious life of the community.

The meeting adjourned with a program of activity and investigation upon every heart, sufficient to fill the thought of the entire congregation for the coming month. Slowly but surely, every member was beginning to feel the obligations not only of living the Christian life, but of doing something to help somebody else.

CHRIST'S CALL — OUR OPPORTUNITY

Rom. 13: 11; I. Cor. 15: 34; Eph. 5: 7-14.

O Christian, why sleep? There is work now to do;
The harvest is great and the laborers are few;
We are "fishers of men," and the Lord has called YOU.

"For some have no knowledge of God" and His love.
"I speak to your shame"; for our Father above
Would have them ALL know of His wonderful love.

There are millions that teem in the darkness of night;
With their outstretched hands, they are groping for light.
Can it be "Child of God" you are NOT in the fight?

You want an investment,—then here is the best;
It is one that endures and gives life a new zest,
'Tis to answer the heathen—their undying QUEST.

Yes! 'twill give you a peace that never can cloy;
You'll greet them in heaven with rapturous joy—
That poor Chinese girl, that black African boy:

You say that your Saviour once saved you from sin;
Yes, He saved you to serve, and others to win.
O, then labor that now they may ALL "enter in."

Aye, "into" that land of sweet heavenly rest
Now possessed by His children from East unto West.
List! your WORKS are of faith—God's infallible test.

But perchance you eternal for temporal things sell,
If that is the case, all cannot be well.
O invest now a life in the things that will tell!

Arise to the work! how can you sit still?
Bring your life into line with the Father's blest will.
He delights with His power POOR in spirit to fill.

GEORGE TESTER.

Current Items of Interest to Friends

CALIFORNIA YEARLY MEETING

Long Beach.—The Long Beach Meeting has had the unusual experience of holding a series of evangelistic services of two weeks' duration, when the preaching was nearly all by the pastors of the city. Upon invitation the pastors of the city heartily commended the plan, and every one of them preached a thoroughly orthodox, evangelistic sermon. The congregations were made up almost entirely of Christians, but they were strengthened for better endeavor. John T. Hadley, our Yearly Meeting Evangelistic Superintendent, preached on the second Sabbath, and Dr. Sylvester Newlin closed the meeting on Friday night following. While the meetings did not result in statistics which we all like to hear from evangelistic effort, there was a unifying feeling and fellowship preparatory for better work, and no doubt there is a record of life work done and kept more accurately than often appears.

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING

Cowan.—The pastor began revival services on November 30, 1913, and continued till December 21. Roy Amburn, of Parker, Indiana, and Elvan Thornburg, of Jericho Meeting, came on Tuesday, December 2d, and remained until the close of the meeting, Brother Amburn doing the main part of the preaching. The spirit of conviction was in the meeting from the beginning, there being two seekers at the altar the first night. There were five renewals, six conversions, and one sanctified, and we feel much good seed was sown which will yet bring forth fruit. There were six accessions to the Church.

Keystone.—Our revival services began December 25, 1913, and continued until January 16, 1914, with the pastor, Mearl Wilson, in charge, assisted by Roy Amburn, of Parker, Indiana, who did the preaching, and by Miss Myrl Hough and Miss Ethel Baldwin, of Cowan, who had charge of the singing. In all forty-two services were held, resulting in twenty-two seekers at the altar. The Church was much revived by the meeting and the interest in our regular services has greatly increased. We are looking forward to greater things. Brother Amburn's preaching was plain, powerful and along Bible lines. The young ladies were much blessed of the Lord in the meeting and their singing was a great inspiration.

New Garden.—New Garden near

Fountain City, Indiana, has recently experienced one of the most helpful revivals in the history of the meeting. The efforts begun with two weeks of cottage prayer meetings which served to get the Church in condition for work. The services at the church continued for three weeks, which resulted in twenty-two persons finding the Savior, the majority of whom were men and women in the middle walks of life. The meetings were conducted by the pastor, Leslie Bond, heartily supported by the membership at large. To the Church and community there has come a great spiritual uplift. A number have expressed a desire to unite with the Church.

IOWA YEARLY MEETING

Ackworth.—Ackworth Quarterly Meeting of Friends was held at Indianola, Iowa, February 21, 1914. All of the pastors of the Quarterly Meeting were present, also E. Howard Brown, of Earlham, who spoke on the evenings of the 20th, 21st and 22d, on the subjects of Jamaica and International Peace. His lectures were illustrated by stereopticon views. H. R. Keates, Yearly Meeting Superintendent, was also with us, and very ably brought the message in the meeting for worship on Saturday. His message was a strength to all present and an inspiration to a deeper consecration. The afternoon session was given to the business of the church. Much need was felt for a deeper sense of the needs of the Church. It was decided to hold a one day conference in each Monthly Meeting belonging to the Quarterly Meeting. The feeling seemed to be that greater things might be accomplished in the work of the Lord.

KANSAS YEARLY MEETING

Bartleville, Oklahoma.—God has given us good meetings and has graciously poured out His Holy Spirit upon us the past month. We have just closed a most successful revival meeting on February 15. Mr. and Mrs. John S. Jones, of Coyle, Oklahoma, were our Evangelists, and we can all say it was good for them to be with us. They presented the old time salvation, the kind that keeps men and women from sin. This was a meeting of victory and blessing to the Church. Thirty souls were saved and others were sanctified, for which we give "God all the glory."

Twenty young men and women were united with the Vera Friends' Church, and still others have expressed a desire to unite with our meeting. I believe we can all say conscientiously this has been the best year of our Christian experiences.

NEBRASKA YEARLY MEETING

Plainview.—A twenty-two days' revival meeting closed here Sunday night, February 1st. A number were converted, and twelve have made request for membership in the Church. While not so many were saved as we had hoped for, yet we feel that this was one of the best meetings we have ever had, and that much was accomplished for the good of the Church. The evangelists, Theo. and Estella Foxworthy, presented the Gospel in a clear and convincing manner, and their special singing added much to each service. They were untiring in their visitation work and in their labors for the salvation of souls which, doubtless, will yet bear more fruit to the glory of God.

NEW YORK YEARLY MEETING

Ferrisburg, Vermont.—Ferrisburg Quarterly Meeting was held at Monkton Ridge, Vermont, the 7th and 8th of February. There were but few in attendance. A snow and rain storm kept some away. There were no visitors. David Borton gave a lucid exposition of the parable of the Prodigal Son, which was helpful. Another spoke of the vast difference between two of the foremost men of the day. Charles E. Elliott represents the intellectual, with his new theology (Unitarianism), and William A. Sunday, the Evangelist, whose revival at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, was the greatest ever known. Several engaged in prayer and testimony. The Clerks were not present. The Monthly Meeting Clerk took the place. Repairs have been made on the house, but there has been no occupant since the first of last October. The mission report states that one family expended $65.00 for support of a child and partly another in India. Another family paid nearly as much for various missions and orphanages.

WESTERN YEARLY MEETING

First Church, Indianapolis.—Professor Elbert Russell, of Earlham College, occupied the pulpit at First Friends' Church, Indianapolis, Indiana, both morning and evening on Sunday, February 22d, in the absence of the pastor, W. O. Trueblood, who was at Earlham conducting an evangelistic series of meetings among the students. The messages of Professor Russell were very acceptable and especially practical and helpful.

Bloomingtondale.—Bloomingtondale Quarterly Meeting was held February 20-22, with a good degree of interest in all departments of work. Mary Pickett, who recently returned from her work in Victoria, Mexico, gave a very interesting talk before the Missionary Conference. Enos Harvey gave a very instructive address on "Types in the Tabernacle," before the Bible School Conference. Robert Pelt, of Sheridan, who is assisting the pastor in a series of meetings at Bloomingtondale, was present and gave stirring messages.

Walnut Chapel.—I. Gurney Lee recently held a ten days' meeting at Walnut Chapel in Putnam County, in which the power of God was manifested in saving precious souls.

Eagle Creek.—Levi Cox assisted a part of the time by Asa Woodard, held a very successful meeting at Eagle Creek in Hamilton County during January, in which there were a large number professed blessing in pardon or the baptism of the Holy Spirit.

Union Hill.—Asa Woodard recently conducted a two weeks' meeting at Union Hill Church near Plainfield, where the meeting had been disbanded for some months. More than twenty in the meridian of life were definitely blessed and the work will be re-organized with a good force of workers.

Courtland Avenue, Kokomo.—On January 15th, C. F. Stroup, of Olivet, Illinois, an evangelist, formerly of Columbus, Ohio, began a series of meetings at Courtland Avenue Friends' Church, Kokomo, Indiana. The meetings continued for sixteen days. The Gospel was preached in all of its purity and in the demonstration and power of the Holy Spirit. About thirty received definite blessing. There were some conversions and renewals, and four received the baptism of the Spirit. The Church was much strengthened and the kingdom of our Lord built up. Brother Stroup is a forceful evangelist. On the last Sabbath the meeting was one of unusual blessing. Mr. Morris, a student in Up-land University, was with us. Brother Stroup's wife brought the message on Sabbath morning.

THE FIVE YEARS MEETING

Joseph John Mills, General Secretary, has just issued "Central Bureau Bulletin No. 1," which he has compiled upon the authority of the Executive Committee of the Five Years Meeting. It is a splendid statement of the purposes and work of this central body, and includes a brief write-up of the work and plans of each Board. There are fourteen pages of printed matter in pamphlet form, and a copy of it should be in every Friends' family in America. It is a book that will answer many questions that are constantly being raised, and cannot fail to have an important influence upon the work of the Church during the next year or two.

THE NEW QUARTERLIES

The new Quarterlies being issued by the Bible School Board of the Five Years Meeting are off the press and will be ready for distribution in a few days. The Adult Quarterly is a forty page booklet, while the Teachers' Quarterly has fifty-six pages.

Our Bible Schools will find these Quarterlies, together with the Leaflets, worthy of a place in every Friends' School in America. The printing is being done by The Nicholson Printing & Manufacturing Company, Richmond, Indiana, and the mechanical work is of a high order. Orders should be sent to Richard Haworth, President of the Board, Fairmount, Indiana.

NEW YORK NOTICE

There will be a pilgrimage to Matinico Meeting, Locust Valley, Long Island, on Third month 8th. This pilgrimage is under the direction of the New York Joint Fellowship Committee. Visiting Friends are invited to attend the morning meeting at 11:00 a. m., and to remain for the afternoon conference at 2:30 p. m. The conference topic has been announced as "As to Friends." Trains leave Pennsylvania Station, New York, and Flatbush Avenue, Brooklyn, at 9:00 a. m.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Editor, The American Friend:

I have just been reading with a great deal of interest and profit W. Teignmouth Shore's "John Woolman, His Life and Our Times," published by Macmillan & Company. It is a companion book of "The Trial of Our Faith," by the late Dr. Thomas Hodgkin; "The Beginnings of Quakerism," by Wm. C. Braithwaite; and "The Quakers in the American Colonies," "Studies in Mystical Religion" and "Spiritual Reformers in the 16th and 17th Centuries," by Rufus M. Jones, all of which should be in every public library that has any considerable number of Friend readers. I am sure that many Friends will wish to own the entire set of books.

Sincerely,

ROBERT L. KELLY.

PERSONAL MENTION

Martilia and Mary A. Cox are engaged in revival service at Providence Meeting in West Grove Quarter, Indiana.

Joseph Johnson, of Darlington, Indiana, an AMERICAN FRIEND subscriber, recently passed his ninetieth birthday. He is among our oldest subscribers, having taken both the Friends' Review and Christian Worker.

Robert Pelt was called from Bloomingtondale, Indiana, where he was engaged in Evangelistic services, to Smithfield, Ohio, on account of the death of his father-in-law. The meetings were continued by the pastor, Enos Harvey.

William G. Hubbard, of Sandy Lake, Pennsylvania, has been invited to become a member of the National Citizens' Committee to bring about the calling of a third Hague Peace Conference. Andrew D. White and Joseph Choate are at the head of the Committee.

FRIENDS' MISSIONARY ADVOCATE

The January number of the Friends Missionary Advocate contains a portion of the address by Dr. John R. Mott to the London Friends Foreign Missionary Association. It is so full of value that it should be read and studied by every Friend. Dr. Mott is the Chairman of the Edinboro Continuation Committee, that is the head organization for Foreign Missions in the work. He seems to understand Friends and their mission remarkably well, he being a member of another denomination. His wide knowledge of the religious denominations of the world, and their work in the foreign field give to his expressions great weight and force.

The February number contains the Annual Report of the American Friends Board which is of great value. We get a view of each field where Friends are at work, and also have the opportunity to learn what the local meetings contribute for the work. This report should be in every Friend's home and kept for reference.

The March number reports the recent Student Volunteer Convention, that is always most inspiring. This convention is held only once in four years, and is one of the most powerful in its results for foreign missions of any religious gathering that convenes on that subject. This number also has something of interest concerning the approaching Triennial Conference of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Union of Friends. More about it will appear in the April number. Every Friend, who would keep abreast of our Missionary work should have the Missionary Advocate.

THAT CONFERENCE OF MEN

We still continue to receive numerous letters concerning the proposed conference of men, which shows that it is beginning to take hold upon the thought of our people throughout the denomination. Most of these letters continue to be favorable, but we present one this week in opposition. We present the following as samples of those which have been received.

Luke Woodard, Fountain City, Indiana.—I have read with interest the various communications in regard to a conference of men. It is a question, I suppose, like many others, that has two sides, and may it not be well to have something said on the other side?

With me, it is not a question of sex representation, but one of feasibility, advisability and utility. In the first place, how shall it originate? There is no organized body, so far as I know, that is back of it. If it is to be the result of the conclusion of individuals, be the number smaller or larger, to hold such a conference at their own charges, I suppose they have the right to do so. It is worth considering, however, whether it would be the wisest expenditure of means, in view of the need of funds by the different organizations already under the care of the church.

If it is expected that the Yearly Meetings shall father the scheme, what number, if not all, would be considered requisite? Is it probable that any Yearly Meeting would assume the responsibility of sending delegates to a conference, paying expenses, the scope and purpose of which are not clearly defined? For myself, I do not think it would be wise for our Yearly Meetings, already in need of funds to carry on the various lines of work for which they have assumed the responsibility, to take on this additional expense, which, if the conference were attended by members from the various parts of our widely extended borders sufficient to make it worth while, would run up to thousands of dollars. If it be said in reply, such a measure would possibly increase the general interest so as to facilitate the raising of funds,—this, at most, is conjectural and is hardly sufficient to balance the certainty on the other hand, of an actual outlay. Besides, have we not machinery already in the way of Secretaries, Committees, "Boards" and Commissions, to make appeals with cogent reasons, to awaken and interest in financial support?

Let anyone who has the Minutes of the last Five Years Meeting, observe as found on page 286, that there is a catalogue of ten Boards to which is committed almost every conceivable department of legitimate church service. There are well up to three hundred persons, counting some duplicates, on these various Boards, embracing representative members within the limits of the several American Yearly Meetings. In addition, some of them have their own Superintendents and Secretaries. What could be done by a Conference, that cannot be better done by these in the various localities where they reside?

Lastly, if those favoring the Conference, have not well-defined topics, and ideas on the same, matured for presentation when the delegates meet, why take this expensive method to find out what they are met for? If any have clearly in mind the proper subjects, and the methods of dealing with these topics, a symposium which our papers would no doubt give space for, would reach a much larger number, with far less trouble and expense, than would be reached by such a conference as the one proposed.

J. Edgar Williams, Carthage, Indiana.—I have heartily approved of thy idea of a call for a Men's Conference. It is not in any sense doing violence to our doctrines to leave our women friends out, and that part of the discussion has appeared childish and useless.

However, I wish to offer an amended plan, and I suggest the following: That instead of one conference, we undertake the holding of four in four different sections, in order to reach all classes and a larger group of men. For New York, New England, Baltimore and Philadelphia and Canada, I would suggest a conference in Philadelphia or Brooklyn. For Indiana, Western, Ohio, and North Carolina, one at Richmond. For Kansas, Iowa and Nebraska, at Des Moines or Oskaloosa. For all west of that, at Whittier, Berkeley or Newberg, Oregon.

For the leadership and speakers of these conferences, I would suggest a team of six selected men—capable men in their line, and assign to these leaders the work they each could best perform, and let them hold these meetings in a similar fashion to the Men and Religion and Laymen's Missionary Conferences. Besides, I would use in each conference, such other of the ministers, business and professional men as the local fields could supply with profit. In this way, more men would come in touch with expert teachers and local needs come more nearly being met.

ADA E. LEE, Asheboro, N. C.—I have been especially interested in the discussion with reference to a Conference of men and have wondered why there should be so much discussion before the Conference can be called. If the men in the Friends Church feel the need of such a Conference, why not call it instead of stirring up a "left out" feeling among the women Friends. I am sure it should enlist both gratitude and endorsement from the women to know that the men are going to get a little "coaching" which will probably bring them along side of the women in active service for the Church. I have thought ever since I attended that great Layman's Missionary Conference in Dayton, Ohio, that such a conference of men of the Friends Church would not only solve many of our present problems and consecrate much financial aid to the work, but would develop the gift of leadership which lies dormant in many of our talented lay members. God bless the Conference of men and give the Church a backing which she has never yet had from her gifted manhood.

Ella C. Coffin, Oskaloosa, Iowa.—I hope the proposed Men's Conference will materialize. I believe we should carefully maintain our historical position as to woman's place in the church, but I do not see that this proposition touches that question. When men's and women's business meetings were held separately, the men transacted much business on financial lines, etc., that the women knew little about. It was the logical order of things, and no objection to it was ever offered, apparently.

H. O. MILES, Ludlow Falls, O.—The various articles in THE AMERICAN FRIEND relative to a meeting of men to consider the needs of our Society have been interesting to me. The plan appeals to me as very good. It seems certain that a careful examination and discussion of our problems, with a frank and free exchange of ideas from representatives of different localities, would only result in a greater knowledge of how to deal with them. By all means let's have the meeting.

ALICE PATTERSON GREEN, Muncie, Ind.—I am humiliated beyond expression at this controversy that has arisen over the plan for the men's Conference. By all means they should have it, and the time taken in this way should have been expended in plans for the same. That any thought of it meaning any lack of deference to us women, only goes to show how far we are from being grown up.

DES MOINES (IOWA) MONTHLY MEETING —The subject of the proposed Conference of men Friends was brought before the meeting. The plan was heartily endorsed and the meeting directed that an invitation be extended through the columns of THE AMERICAN FRIEND that the sessions of such a Conference be held in the Friends Church, Des Moines, Iowa.

Friends' Brotherhood, Des Moines, Iowa.—The Brotherhood of the Friends' Church in Des Moines, Iowa, heartily approves of a Conference of men, and extends an invitation to meet in Des Moines.

Sincerely,
O. M. HOMAN, President.
O. E. KELLOGG, Secretary.

JOHN R. WALTER, Poplar Ridge, N. Y.—I have watched the discussion in regard to a gathering for men with great interest and hope. I hope they will not delay for I think it is one way that may help to turn the tide for the better in our American Yearly Meetings.

P. W. RAIDABAUGH, Plainfield, Ind.—While I am writing I want to say that I most heartily endorse your plan for a men's gathering.

2. Do you think that Friends have still a testimony to bear with regard to (a) Dress? (b) Expenditures on luxuries? (c) Class distinction? If so, how should such testimony be borne?

3. Who is the more likely to influence the world with high ideals—a man as scrupulous as John Woolman, or one who follows the world's conventions in order to understand those whom he seeks to influence?

BIBLE SCHOOL LESSON

March 15.

Subject.—The Lawful Use of the Sabbath.

Lesson.—Luke 13: 10-17; 14: 1-6.

Golden Text.—The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath. —Mark 2: 27.

Time.—January A.D. 30.

Place.—Perea.

The Jews were slaves to custom. They were in bondage to the form of the law, but knew not its spirit. This is not a lesson against Sabbath observance, or Sabbath legislation, but against their abuse.

Jesus set the example of observing the day by going to the place of worship, the synagogue, and there, as was his custom, teaching the people. But Jesus was more than a teacher of principles or an expounder of religious law. His office as a healer of human maladies was no less important, and here we find him healing disease as a part of the religious service.

True to his traditions, the ruler of the synagogue protests and seeks to draw a sharp line of cleavage between the religious and the secular act. Christ's answer was direct and conclusive. The beasts must be cared for every day. Why not a woman, of the seed of Abraham? Jesus had a way of appealing to the common practices of that day in order to justify his right to relieve human suffering any day or under any circumstances.

Judaism had made the law of the Sabbath a law of bondage. They had lost the spirit in the letter. Externalists were emphasized overmuch, and Jesus was simply trying to rescue the day from the maze of trivial observances which characterized it so strongly.

The Jews were willing to keep people in distress in order that the form of the law should be kept. Jesus showed that human betterment was above every rite and every custom. The law of usage must be the law of helpfulness. "The Sabbath was made for man," for his uplift, for his rest from the grind of daily toil, for his spiritual development. The Sabbath per se is not as important as the man or woman, but should ever be used as a holy day, contributing to man's highest good.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR

March 15.

Topic.—Well Stored Memories.—I. Cor. 15: 1-10.

It is urged that at this meeting there be no reading of texts or sentences, that there be no slips brought from which to read. Let it be a meeting at which each member will speak or pray out of his heart.

Emphasize the importance of retaining the good and forgetting the bad. The mind ought to be a sieve that will separate the truth from that which is evil. This can be done only by care, by practice, and by the aid of the Spirit.

The mind should be stored with the best, the best in the Bible, in literature, in knowledge. God's law should be written on the heart.

STOP AT MINNEAPOLIS

Minneapolis is particularly distinguished by the fact that it has the only Friends' Meeting, save one, in the state of Minnesota. This meeting was established in the late fifties; and, being rather removed from the center of Friends' activities, has always been regarded as one of the outposts of Quakerism. But now, with the rapidly developing Friends' communities in Oregon and California, it has come to be one of the great "half way points." For trans-continental travel the northern route is becoming more and more popular, so that Friends are almost continually passing to and fro through our city. The purpose of this article is to let Quakerdom know that we are still here, and to insist that English and Eastern Friends, as well as those of

NO GUSHER

But Tells Facts About Postum

A Wis. lady found an easy and safe way out of the ills caused by coffee. She says:

"We quit coffee and have used Postum for the past eight years, and drink it nearly every meal. We never tire of it.

"For several years previous to quitting coffee I could scarcely eat anything on account of dyspepsia, bloating after meals, palpitation, sick headache—in fact was in such misery and distress I tried living on hot water and toast.

"Hearing of Postum I began drinking it and found it delicious. My ailments disappeared, and now I can eat anything I want without trouble.

"My parents and husband had about the same experience. Mother would often suffer after eating, while yet drinking coffee. My husband was a great coffee drinker and suffered from indigestion and headache.

"After he stopped coffee and began Postum both ailments left him. He will not drink anything else now and we have it three times a day. I could write more but am no gusher—only state plain facts."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Write for a copy of the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville."

Postum now comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

MINUTE OF YORKSHIRE QUARTERLY MEETING OF THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS, HELD AT YORK, ENGLAND, JANUARY 20, 1914.

We have had before us at different sittings, the growing evils of the war systems of Europe; their oppressiveness to the industrial populations; their wastefulness of the resources of the nations over methods of mutual destruction; their degrading effect in implanting mutual mistrust, jealousy and hate in the minds of men.

We have also listened to accounts from our friend, John W. Barry, of the proceedings against Friends and very many others, under the Defence Acts of Australia; proceedings resulting in severe punishments and in the suffering of parents and their sons, for holding fast to some of their most cherished religious convictions, and refusing to sanction the turning of the boys into the legal status of soldiers under military compulsion, to the ruthless setting aside of their home training and associations.

We feel that the militarism of the day is largely responsible for the growing cleavage between the democracies and the historic churches of Christendom, which should be the first to uphold the glad tidings of peace and good-will to men; and under a renewed sense of the emphatic duty of spreading a truer view of the fundamental principles of the Christian dispensation, we appeal to our members, both collectively and individually, to seek by prayer and closer communion with the Lord for more strength and guidance in taking our full part in the doing of His will and the advancement of His kingdom on the Earth.

Immigration figures show that the population of Canada increased during 1913, by the addition of 400,000 new settlers from the United States and Europe. Most of these have gone on farms in provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Lord William Percy, an English Nobleman, says:

"The possibilities and opportunities offered by the Canadian West are so infinitely greater than those which exist in England, that it seems absurd to think that people should be impeded from coming to the country where they can most easily and certainly improve their position."

New districts are being opened up, which will make accessible a great number of homesteads in districts especially adapted to mixed farming and grain raising.

Has That City Room for Me?

By J. W. MICHAEL, REDDICK, ILL.

Once, when lonely, I sat musing,
And my dreams ran far away,
To a city full of beauty,
In a land as fair as day.
While I mused my faint heart wondered
Will there be a place for me?
O my faint heart often wonders,
While in prayer is bent the knee,
In life's dark and lonely hour,
Has that city room for me?

While I looked and longed and wondered,
Came some heavenly breezes bringing
Songs of rapturous joy and gladness,
Which an angel choir was singing.
Can there be, my heart still wondered,
In that song a note for me?

Just beyond the angelic chorus,
Beamed the face of father, mother,
Saintly, as in days of yore.
By their side stood sister, brother,
Who had left me long ago;
And I cried, with earnest longing,
Have you there a place for me?

But my heart grew faint and sickened,
As I saw the man of sin.
Then there came the Man of Sorrows;
Showed me where the nails had been;
Said with voice so soft and tender,
"Yes, there still is room for thee."
And my heart is faint no longer,
When in prayer is bent the knee,
In life's dark and lonely hour.
There is room up there for me!

A Monthly Meeting Chronicle

BY JUNIUS JUNIOR

IX.

Slow Valley Monthly Meeting was on the up-grade. There could be no mistake about it. Men and women, who for years had scarcely given a thought to the work of the Church, were now in evidence upon every occasion with all the zeal of new converts to a worthy cause. The meeting had opened out its heart to them by sending its own representatives as messengers interested in their spiritual welfare, and now they were doing the natural thing in revealing their interest in the meeting.

The pastor had returned with fresh inspiration and thrilled the September session of the Monthly Meeting with a sermon on Christian living as the fountain from which springs Christian service. It was a message that brought a new light into many eyes and a new feeling of responsibility into many hearts, and even the most conservative were touched by the genuineness of its appeal.

It developed that rally day, on the previous Sabbath, was the surprise of all the many surprises that were coming to Slow Valley Meeting. The entire resident membership with the exception of a small family of four were in attendance, while one hundred and forty-two others had been attracted by the remarkable activity of a membership that within less than a year had thrown off to a large extent the yoke of selfishness and indifference. The meeting house had been full and overflowed into the Sabbath school room. The sermon had breathed the spirit of consecration and fellowship, while the resident minister had prayed with an unction that brought refreshing to every heart.

But all of Slow Valley's problems were not yet solved. What was equally important, however, was the fact that so many of the members were applying themselves to their solution. The reports from the Quarterly Meeting were encouraging and each delegate had something to say about the spiritual uplift that had been felt during the sessions of the higher body.

The Sabbath School Committee reported that they had purchased forty new chairs and that special collections at the Bible School during the month had provided for half the expense, the balance of which was directed to be paid from the Monthly Meeting treasury. The Committee renewed the recommendation for an addition to the meeting house to furnish a home for the primary department. In the face of some decided objections the Committee was directed to draw up plans and ascertain the cost of the proposed addition, the same to be reported to the next Monthly Meeting.

One of the women expressed concern over the state of the non-resident members, and felt that in some way the meeting should manifest its interest in their welfare. A lively discussion followed, in which three members suggested that these names be dropped, or their rights of membership be sent to other meetings. It was proposed, however, and carried, that the Clerk be directed to send a fraternal letter to each one expressive of the meeting's interest in their welfare, and ascertain the desire of each relative to his membership.

The Committee on invitation and welcome reported a month's activity, and said that a system of friendly visitations was being worked out in permanent form. As a result of this personal work, eight applications for membership in the meeting were presented, and after many expressions of thankfulness, the customary committees were named to investigate these applications and report at the October meeting. The Committee reported further that a sentiment was developing in the neighborhood of the Bennett school house, four miles to the southwest, to have a Sabbath School in the afternoon. One family of Friends lived only a mile away and two others near by had been raised Friends. After consideration, the matter was referred to the Bible School Committee for further investigation.

The Committee appointed to see that a Christian Endeavor Society was organized, reported that the first meeting had been held the preceding Sabbath evening at 6 o'clock. After a time of earnest prayer, a roll of twenty-two charter members was secured and a nominating committee was appointed to report officers at the next meeting. The outlook was encouraging for a live C. E. Society.

The Committee on the relationship of the meeting to the community made an interesting report on conditions among the foreigners. It was found that there were more than 350 foreigners in the city, a considerable number of whom were men without families, although there were not fewer than eighty children among them. These foreigners were largely Italians and Hungarians with a sprinkling of Croatians, and while the Committee had had time only for a surface examination, the conditions of life among them were not reassuring. A new saloon had recently been started adjoining the foreign quarter which was

Having a Consciousness of God

In this day when the world seems to be rushing mad after business, and after pleasure, it is not always easy to get man's thoughts turned inward upon what he really is before the omnipotent God. Every business line must have the latest and most improved machinery, every laboratory must have the best appliances, every railroad must be at its best in every department, government itself must be progressive and abreast of the age of which it is a part, but all too often the standards of man as man in the world are antiquated and not even of average quality.

No man can be at his best even for this world if he does not have a pervading sense of Jehovah. The distractions of busy life are apt to dull the consciousness of the Divine Spirit. God's presence in daily life is the only guarantee of the highest success.

The need of the age is not for good men and women, but for the best men and women. God deals with superlatives more truly even than does the business or the material world. How many there are who fail in emergencies, who lack the ability to stand the tests of life, who, saddest of all, fail to measure up to God's requirements in human life!

No man can know the buoyancy that may come into his thought, his purposes, his ambitions, his daily service, unless he have a consciousness of God's presence in his soul. Without it man's energies are constantly being consumed by battling against unseen tides, by the friction of ceaseless worries, by rubbing against hidden corners that wear away the life whose path is not illumined by a celestial presence.

The Church lacks power when it loses the consciousness of the Father and seeks to walk by tradition or custom and allows itself to be governed by the doctrines of expediency. The revelations of Jehovah are not provincial, either as regards time or place. He who came and talked with Abraham, who appeared to Moses in the burning bush, who touched the vision of the old prophets, who came into that upper room on the day of Pentecost, who stood by the martyrs in the midst of the fagots and gave them sustaining grace, is no less ready now in the twentieth century to direct human life that is willing to be obedient to His call.

The greatest experience which may come to any life is to have the consciousness of God's indwelling Spirit. It is the normal relationship between man and God. It is found through surrender and consecration. It is maintained by watchfulness and prayer and a diligent purpose to have God enthroned in every thought and act of life. It is an experience that is genuine, without which life is dull and impotent. He who has learned how to walk with God will eat fruit from the tree of life, and enjoy the heavenly atmosphere that envelops every consecrated soul.

Our Financial System

The message of the General Secretary in this issue is most opportune. The Church is languishing almost from lack of adequate financial support. The machinery is running, but it lacks power. Some are giving now until it hurts. The solution of the problem does not lie in laying heavier burdens upon these, but in distributing the burden to the shoulders of others.

Our financial plan lacks system, and lacking system, the burden is distributed unevenly and therefore unjustly. It is a pity that Friends have not prepared themselves for better results from the United Mission campaign, which is culminating this month. It is not too late yet for many of our meetings to adopt the plan, and by means of the "every-member" canvass, place their finances upon a more substantial basis. The work of many of our Church Boards and Committees is waiting upon this action. The message of Dr. Mills, and the statements of those whom he quotes should be read and studied earnestly and prayerfully. This is one of the burning questions to which the Church must apply itself right speedily, if it is to maintain its rightful heritage.

Quoting Public Men

A correspondent calls our attention to the fact that a communication in THE AMERICAN FRIEND for December 13, 1913, quotes President Roosevelt as saying in a speech on May 8, 1908, at the laying of a corner-stone of the Bureau of American Republics, "There is no question but what may be settled by arbitration." As our correspondent points out, an examination of the official report of President Roosevelt's address on the occasion in question shows nothing to justify this quotation (see the Bulletin of the Bureau of American Republics for May, 1908, pages 18 and 19). He states, however, that the press reports of the occasion show that President Roosevelt departed from his formal address to quote from Secretary Root's address on the same occasion. In the course of this informal "interlude," as he called it, President Roosevelt said:

"The Secretary said: 'There are no international controversies so serious that they cannot be settled peaceably if both parties really desire peaceable settlement, while there are few causes of dispute so trifling that they cannot be made the occasion of war if either party really desires war. The matters in dispute between nations are nothing; the spirit which deals with them is everything.' Let me add that if we build our fleet up as we should they won't really desire war. Do not misunderstand me. My advocacy of peace is sincere and rational."—Washington Post, May 12, 1908.

It will be observed that the statement quoted from Secretary Root, that "There are no international controversies so serious that they cannot be settled peaceably (not by "arbitration") if both parties really desire peaceable settlement," is very different from the quotation attributed to Mr. Roosevelt in the correspondence of THE AMERICAN FRIEND of December 13, last, which latter appears to be inconsistent with his often expressed views. See generally, the chapter in his recent autobiography, entitled "The Peace of Righteousness," and particularly, page 579.

The point of this matter is that all writers should be exceedingly careful to quote public men correctly.

The Necessity of Increased Efficiency in Denominational Colleges

BY ROBERT L. KELLY

A very important educational congress was recently held in Chicago under the auspices of the Board of Education of the United Presbyterian Church of North America. Persons interested in the proceedings of this congress can be accommodated by addressing the Board of Education of the United Presbyterian Church, 310 Searles Building, Monmouth, Illinois.

At that meeting a paper was read by Dr. Kendrick C. Babcock, recently specialist in education with the United States Bureau of Education, now Dean of the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences, at the University of Illinois. Some two years ago Dr. Babcock, while connected with the Bureau of Education, was assigned the special task of classifying American colleges. He undoubtedly made the most exhaustive study of American colleges from the special standpoint of their ability to prepare students for graduate study in the great graduate universities that has ever been made. He, therefore, speaks as an educational expert of high order. In the course of his address, which was filled with material of the highest value, he took occasion to refer in commendatory terms to Friends' education and certain Friends' colleges. Because of this fact, and also because of the intrinsic worth of his utterances I submit herewith a number of quotations from his address. I am sure they will be read with interest by all Friends who are interested in the development of our educational work.

"Viewed as a whole, the transit of civilization in America from the Atlantic shore to the Pacific coast, has been marked by a multitude of experiments in higher education. Alongside the successes, one finds the tombstones of multitudes of misdirected efforts and mistaken plans. In Ohio alone, more than one hundred colleges and universities have been chartered. Forty of these still survive and are listed as such by the United States Bureau of Education; twenty-three are still in organic relation with some religious denomination. In Iowa, twenty-five still survive, eighteen being a part of the denominational equipment of various churches. * * *

"The widest variation exists in the institutions calling themselves universities or colleges. It is possible thus to trace the curve of efficiency through uncounted gradations from these pathetic embryo colleges up to such admirably successful and solid institutions as Wesleyan University, Beloit College and Haverford College, not to mention Columbia University, the University of Chicago, and great state supported institutions, the tide of whose annual revenues have passed the two million dollar mark. * * *

"As a man who has spent practically all his working life in state universities, and who may therefore claim to know them, and the forces which are moving them, I believe I may safely say that the Christian college, whether directly allied with a denominational organization or taking convenient refuge under the title of 'non-sectarian,' still sets standards even for state institutions for well-defined efforts for the promotion of Christian character and religious activity. * * *

"Obviously the competitive standards of efficiency which a denominational college must meet today is quite a different matter from the standards of twenty or forty years ago. Whether the appeal of the college be, first, to its denominational constituency, or to the community within a radius of seventy-five miles, the demands of this rising standard of higher education must ultimately be met. The ideals of some of the churches have changed rapidly. More and more each church * * * has in recent years worked wisely and fruitfully for improving the standards of its denominational institutions. One may count with admiration the steps upward which have been made by such colleges as Hiram, Ohio Wesleyan, Colorado, Oberlin, and Earlham. * * *

"In the long run, each college must meet the competition of other institutions upon a nation-wide plane. The colleges of no denominations will be exempt, whether they be those of the two most consistent churches, the Roman Catholic and the Friends, or whether they be those of the loosely organized Congregational or Baptist Churches. A denomination cannot afford to assume responsibility for a debased or cheap coinage in education. The denomination and college taking such a responsibility will sooner or later find itself in an intolerable position, for grand and worthy ambitions cannot be made permanently to atone for imperfections of present practices. The very name of the institution must square with its promises. * * *

"A salary of three to five thousand dollars will secure a higher type of the combined teacher and scholar, upon whom in the final analysis the success of any college must depend, than will a lower salary, or the attractiveness of membership in this particular teaching force. The college, therefore, must approximate in the quality of its men and women to the standards set by the great and affluent, privately-managed institutions, or state institutions, one of which at the present time is paying sixteen of its teaching staff a salary of $5,000, and ten more a salary of $4,000. * * *

"By way of summary, let me express again my belief in the mission of the denominational college, my admiration for the adjustment which many of the colleges have made to the rising and diversified standards of recent years, and my conviction that if these colleges are to continue as worthy agencies of their churches, they must plan to do whatever work they undertake in such a way that it will be equal to the best work done by any institution of the same class in the same region, no matter by what reagent it is tested."

Conference on United Work in Mexico

BY CHARLES E. TEBBETTS

At the recent meeting of the Conference of Foreign Mission Boards, a special conference was called of those having charge of work in Mexico. The following statement of its work has been issued:

"Believing that the present is an opportune time for the consideration of questions like these, especially in Mexico, the Committee, at the request of representatives of several of the Boards, called a conference of all the Boards carrying on work in Mexico. This conference was held at the time of the Annual Conference of Mission Boards in Garden City on January 14-16, 1914.

"There was a unanimous feeling that the situation in Mexico had presented an occasion for a careful restudy of the missionary work in that country and for such rearrangements which would increase its efficiency and provide more adequately for work throughout the whole country. After full discussion the following conclusions were reached with the understanding that while every Board might not be able to participate in every one of the measures proposed, each Board would do all that it could, and would encourage its missionaries to carry forward the principle of co-operation to the fullest extent in the readjustments of the work in Mexico after the Revolution.

"1. It was voted that it is the judgment of the conference that one missionary paper in Mexico should be sufficient, this paper to provide special facilities wherever desired for the presentation of the work of any one denomination to its constituency.

"2. It was voted that one set of Sunday-School lessons and lesson helps ought to be sufficient with such adaptation as might on occasions be found necessary for the use of particular bodies.

"3. It was voted that it was the judgment of the conference that the separate Mission Press establishments might wisely be merged in one.

"4. It was voted that it was the sense of the conference that the several training schools or theological classes should unite, and that one such school (or, for territorial purposes, perhaps two) would serve the purpose in Mexico.

"5. It was voted that the question of co-operation in arranging property titles or securing any proper government recognition should be referred to the Committee on Latin-America, with authority to confer with the Committee on Reference and Council if deemed wise.

"6. It was voted that it was the sense of the conference that the Girls' Schools should co-operate and unite wherever possible, and that the Committee on Latin-America, after conference with the Women's Boards having Girls' Schools in Mexico, should make a suggested scheme of co-ordination and unity for these schools.

"7. It was voted that it was the sense of the conference that there might wisely be some redistribution of territory, looking to the more adequate occupation of the field, and the matter was referred to the Latin-American Committee with the request that they confer with the Boards to ascertain whether there could be adjustments made which would secure the occupation of the whole field.

"8. It was voted that there should be a conference of missionaries at work in Mexico, held either in the United States or in Mexico as should be deemed best, to make a restudy of the work in Mexico, and to carry out the plans recommended by this conference when approved by the Boards.

"9. It was voted to recommend to the Missionaries in Mexico the preparation of a statement to the Mexican nation, after the fashion of the statement issued by the missionaries in Japan last year, showing the substantial unity of the Missions in their message and appealing to the Mexican people with a united voice at this time of their realization of their needs, such a statement to be ready to be issued when the present time of disorder is past. It was suggested that the missionaries now in Mexico City might at once take in hand the preparation of such a statement to be submitted to Missionaries in other parts of the country and prepared for the signature of as many of the Missionaries in Mexico as possible.

"10. It was voted that the attention of the Missions be called to the desirability of arranging for the transfer, between denominations, of church members moving from one section of the country to the other, according to the principle which has been recognized by all the churches including the Church of England and the Friends in fields like Madagascar.

"11. It was voted to recommend to the Latin-American Committee that it should enlarge itself by adding one member from each Board carrying on missionary work in Latin-America in order that the Committee might be fully representative, this enlarged committee to authorize the present committee, or some correspondingly small number from the enlarged committee, to act as an executive for the whole committee.

"12. That in view of the fact that there are more than twenty Girls' Schools conducted by the Missions in Mexico, in some cases three or four in a single city, the following possible adjustments in the interest of increased efficiency in the educational work for girls be considered by the Boards immediately concerned:

"(a) The possible union of the various Girls' and Boys' Schools in Chihuahua into two institutions, one for boys and one for girls.

"(b) That the Boards having Girls' Schools in Saltillo obtain from the missionaries there full information as to the location of the schools, their equipment, their distance apart, the needs of the territory involved, the kind of schools required, etc.; that they ask the missionaries to suggest plans for a Union Normal School and for the best form of co-operation in regard to the lower grades.

"(c) That the Missions having Girls' Schools in Guadalajara be asked to consider the wisdom of forming a Union School for the higher grades, and that the opinions of the missionaries should be obtained as to what grades should be excluded from union work and why.

"(d) That the missionaries engaged in educational work for Girls in Mexico City be asked to suggest a plan for uniting in a Union School System for the city, the Northern and Southern Methodists combining two of their schools, and all the Missions uniting to make use of this and of the industrial school, the Presbyterian School in Coyoacan to be made the basis of a union normal school.

"(e) That the Southern Presbyterians and Friends be requested to consider the union of their schools at Matamoras, and the possibility of co-operation in their agricultural schools.

"13. That the Boards interested in the work in Mexico be requested to report this conference with its findings to their missionaries with as large a measure of approval as they are able to give."

The meeting was a most delightful one. All were surprised at the unanimity of feeling that we should advance toward united work, and felt that God was certainly leading us on to the fulfilment of His purpose. If these resolutions are carried out, as it is to be hoped they will be, it will require some readjustment of Friends' work. This will necessarily come before the Mexican Field Committee and the Board for their action. Whatever plans are made should be well matured as soon as possible, so as to be ready to enter into the united campaign to redeem Mexico, as soon as it is possible to take up regular work again.

Friends of Indiana, Western and New York Yearly Meetings, who have had special responsibility for this work in Mexico should take a deep interest in this new phase of the work. It should certainly commend itself to our best thought. We should be prepared to do our full share in the undertaking. Funds to meet the necessary equipment of our part of the work should be in hand so that there may be no delay when it opens. Much good has been accomplished by the work of the past. But this offers a greatly increased opportunity for effective and successful work. It means that the problem is to be undertaken from the standpoint of the broadest missionary statesmanship. God grant that Friends may be ready to do their part of the constructive work made possible by this movement.

Heart Hunger *

BY CHARLES M. WOODMAN

Every man at times gives very earnest thought to his relationships with God, and the great life which lies just beyond the fringe of this one. There is in us all what we may call a heart hunger. The figure is a common one. Hunger is universal. The cravings of appetite make the wheels of the social machinery move. Hunger turns the current of nervous energy into the will, and the will, like the dynamo, forces the hands and the feet into activity to satisfy the hunger. In a similar way the hunger of the heart after God appeals to the will, but the insulation is often so poor, and the physical load on the will is often so heavy, that the appeal is far too frequently a vain one, and the heart hunger remains unsatisfied. As the electric light burns low when the load on the dynamo is heavy, so the heart yearnings often remain unsatisfied when the material loads are crushing in their weight. Nevertheless, there is in us all a real heart hunger after God.

In a recent number of a current magazine there is a thrilling story of the efforts of a Russian prisoner, sentenced to solitary confinement, to communicate with his fellow prisoners in the neighboring cells. The knockings on the wall, the puzzling out of the meaning of the sounds until he found the key to the knock alphabet, the writing of sentences by tying knots in a thread and dropping it in the prison yard, reveal the intense eagerness with which he longed for communication with the world outside his cell. His case is but typical of that heart hunger which longs for and craves communication with the great and infinite Spirit whom we realize ever and again is persistently and patiently knocking from His great world upon the walls of our inner and narrower world, and seeking for some sign of recognition on our part.

Helen Keller, who has thrilled the world with the wonder of her marvelous achievements, groped her way in the dark and the silence to the knowledge she now possesses, through the single sense of touch. Under the tactful, patient skill of her teacher, she learned one day by the sign language made in her hand, that things had names, and that moment the doors of the world which we see and hear swung open to her. We grope our way in the dark and the silence of the inner heart life toward fellowship with the great heart of the universe and the soul of the infinite, and when we learn in some quiet, secret moment that communion with the great Father of our spirits is a reality, the doors of a wide spiritual and eternal world swing open at our touch.

We want to know that the needle of our life with its thread of personal experience, which day after day we industriously sew in and out through the fabric of existence,—we want to know that that life needle is sewing well its part of the great tapestry which had its beginning in the eternity of the past, and in the process of its making is reaching out into the eternity which lies beyond. When we learn this sense of eternal perspective and spiritual proportion of our material life, we shall know the rest and calm and poise of a genuine life. When we have learned the path to the storehouse of eternal supplies, the great heart hunger of our inner life will be satisfied, and we shall enter into the peace which the world can neither give nor take away.

Homiletic Review

Professor John M. Coulter, Ph.D., of the University of Chicago, begins in the Homiletic Review for March the first of a brief series of articles on the attitude of Jesus in reference to certain general conditions. The topic dealt with in this number is on "The Attitude of Jesus Toward a New Religious Movement," and should receive wide and careful attention by leaders in the Church.

Can anything more be said than has been said so often on the subject of faith and its meaning? The answer may be found in a notable contribution by the Rev. P. Gavan Duffy, on "Faith as Venture and Expectation."

Among the other contributors to this number are the following: The Rev. Frederic Campbell, Brooklyn, N. Y.; The Rev. Joseph B. Baker, Gettysburg, Pa.; Professor James Denny, D.D., Glasgow, Scotland; The Rev. T. B. McCorkindale, M. A., Lakefield, Ont.

Recollections of John Maxwell

BY CHARLES F. COFFIN

A donation of $1,000.00 having been made to Earlham College by Hugh W. Maxwell, deceased, in memory of his father, John Maxwell, who died in 1860, as there are few persons now living who would remember him, I have prepared the following notes in reference to him. Although widely different in age, we were interested together in the work of the Church, and I had a profound respect for him.

In the year 1832 my father, Elijah Coffin, introduced the question of the establishment of a Friends' Boarding School in Whitewater Quarterly Meeting, where it met a favorable reception and was forwarded to the Yearly Meeting. Whitewater Quarterly Meeting then contained between two and three thousand members. In each of the Monthly Meetings composing it there were men who had risen to prominence from their good sense and strength of character. Although not highly educated, they had acquired by years of experience a knowledge of the world, which made them of superior intelligence to most of those around them. Amongst these were Elijah Coffin, who was a more highly educated and intelligent person than most of those with whom he mingled. Joseph Cox was a man of superior ability and good judgment. Jacob Elliott was also an earnest Christian and an intelligent man.

Amongst these was John Maxwell, a member and for many years an Elder of West Grove Monthly Meeting. He lived on a beautiful farm two and one-half miles from Centerville in Wayne County, which had upon it a brick house, and altogether, was looked upon as a man "well-to-do" for the time. My recollection of him was connected with his active work in the Church. He was one of the early Friends of the Boarding School, and was a man of excellent judgment and greatly respected.

There was a large deficiency in the supply of Bibles among the members of the Quarterly Meeting, and when my father organized a branch of the Bible Association of Friends in Philadelphia, John Maxwell became an active member. On one occasion when my father was unable to attend, he sent me with the Minutes, and although I was only seventeen years of age, the Friends were so interested in seeing me come that they appointed me Clerk, a position which I occupied for thirty or forty years, until every family of Friends in the Quarterly Meeting was supplied with a copy of the Holy Scriptures and all the readers owned a copy.

John Maxwell was an active man in the work of the Church, at the same time fulfilled his duty as a citizen, and was highly esteemed in the vicinity in which he lived. His house, at the time I mention, was plainly furnished but very comfortable, and I enjoyed his hospitality. He died in 1860 in his seventy-second year, and was greatly missed in the Church and in the community.

THE GENERAL SECRETARY

Financing the Work of the Church

I. Do We Need a Better System of Raising Church Funds?

In order to call out expression upon this question, the General Secretary addressed the following letter to each of forty Friends in thirteen Yearly Meetings, all of them recognized leaders in the financial affairs of the Church: "Dear Friend—The plans of the United Campaign throw a strong light upon the imperfections of our methods, as Friends, for raising money and the little effort we are apparently making to improve them, taking our denomination as a whole. Three or four Yearly Meetings have taken the matter up in a practical way. New England has had the pledge and envelope system on trial in some of its meetings for two years with results that are reported as entirely satisfactory. Mention is made in the minutes of New York Yearly Meeting of a new financial system to be presented to the Quarterly Meetings, the operation of which is made the subject of study this year by a special committee of the Yearly Meeting. North Carolina has a Committee on the Development of Church Finance. Some congregations in other Yearly Meetings have adopted modern methods for raising their church funds. But aside from the foregoing, I do not find that any Yearly Meeting has as yet been touched by the great movement in advanced financial methods that is bringing such gratifying results in some other denominations. If the present demands upon our Boards, both of the Yearly Meetings and the Five Years Meeting, are to be at all adequately provided for, it is imperatively necessary that measures be adopted for largely increasing the contributions of our membership generally. Will thou kindly give me the benefit of thy judgment in regard to the matter from the standpoint of the experience of thy Yearly Meeting as thou sees it?"

As to the particular question of the need for improvement in our financial system, the replies received to the foregoing letter were perfectly unanimous.

SETH K. GIFFORD, member Permanent Board New England Yearly Meeting: "I am sorry we are not yet awake to the necessity of a systematic method of raising funds."

ALFRED BUSSELLE, Treasurer New York Yearly Meeting: "Friends need education in giving in advance of actual expenditures. New York Yearly Meeting is endeavoring to have cash or pledges for $5,000.00 in hand by next Yearly Meeting time for distribution among our main interests for the ensuing year."

ALBERT S. ROGERS, member Representative Meeting Canada Yearly Meeting: "The work of the Church in most meetings is greatly hampered by the lack of more systematic and adequate financing."

JOHN R. CARY, Recording Clerk Baltimore Yearly Meeting: "The financial feature of our situation is one of the weakest, and we shall not go ahead very fast or very far until we teach our people to be more liberal."

J. ELWOOD COX, member Permanent Board North Carolina Yearly Meeting: "How to get Friends to open their purses and contribute to church work, as other denominations do, is about the greatest question that confronts our denomination today. Our membership seems just as loyal as the membership of other Churches except when it comes to raising money. I hope that something may be done to get our Church aroused along this line."

LEVI MILLS, Chairman Five Years Meeting delegation of Wilmington Yearly Meeting: "I called a meeting of Wilmington Yearly Meeting's delegates and submitted to them your letter. Our delegates are deeply conscious of the pressing necessity of a change in our methods of raising church finances in order to increase the same and enlist all our membership in more liberal contribution."

JOSEPH A. GODDARD, former Chairman Evangelistic Board of Indiana Yearly Meeting: "This is a matter in which, as a rule, Friends meetings are quite lax. It would be well if the Yearly Meetings would each adopt a systematic and uniform method of raising money. The members, as a rule, are willing to give to the support of the work if the matter is presented to them in a right way."

WILLIAM P. HENLEY, Trustee Indiana Yearly Meeting: "I certainly think we should have a uniform plan for raising money and meeting our running expenses in order that we may collect more funds than are raised by assessment."

DAVID HADLEY, former Evangelistic Superintendent Western Yearly Meeting: "Our financial methods very greatly need revising and systematizing."

ALBERT W. GREENE, Treasurer Iowa Yearly Meeting: "I am sure that any business prospect would utterly fail if given no more attention and careful thought by those interested than are the finances of the Friends Church. I think that the negligence of so nearly all our members in raising their share of funds is simply because of a lack of system."

FRANCIS A. WRIGHT, member Permanent Board Kansas Yearly Meeting: "I certainly think it very desirable to have an effort made to improve our method of raising finances for the Church."

GEORGE D. WEEKS, Trustee Nebraska Yearly Meeting: "If some method which would be best for the Church at large were adopted as the official method of the Five Years Meeting, it would give us more backing."

DR. LINDLEY M. GREENE, President Permanent Board California Yearly Meeting: "Some better system of finance is greatly needed. The work of the Church would be much less hampered if we could come to our annual gatherings with ample funds in hand to carry on all the church activities for the coming year."

Has any Friend any arguments to offer to the contrary?

already getting in its deadly work, and was more than counteracting the influence of the struggling gospel mission. The Committee recommended that the meeting invite the other three Churches of the city to co-operate with them in assuming control of this mission or in starting a new one as circumstances seemed to warrant.

The report provoked considerable discussion and there was strong objection to the meeting wasting its energies in a direction that gave such little promise of bearing fruit. In the end, however, the progressive element had its way on the theory that if the other Churches were not ready to co-operate, the meeting need not go further, while if they were ready to co-operate, there was every reason why the work should be undertaken. The Clerk was directed to send a formal request to the other Churches for a conference on this subject and the Committee which made the report was appointed to represent Friends in such a conference if one were held.

The special order which had come down from the July session to consider the financial situation was then laid before the meeting. The report was re-read, recommending that collections be taken each Sabbath, that the duplex envelope system be adopted and that the meeting look forward to participating in the "every member" canvass along with other denominations next March. The discussion which followed revealed that the spirit of ultra conservatism in the meeting was not yet dead. The retired farmer, the old physician and the women that were afraid of the new fangled appliances which characterized other Churches were joined by several others in warnings against methods that were so widely different from the traditions of the Church. It was argued on the other hand, however, that necessity demanded a change in the financial system, and that the suggested plan was in harmony with the most efficient and successful plans in vogue in other places. Thus the debate proceeded for an hour, and finally action had to be deferred.

The session had been long drawn out, and it was suggested that other matters be left until the October meeting. The concluding minute was read and, after a prayer for wisdom and guidance, the members dispersed with a feeling that they were facing grave and vital questions that could not be brushed aside because they were difficult, or because they contravened the usual custom.

Traditions

BY L. RICHARD DEAN

To many who accept with little thought a certain deposit of customs, of beliefs or practices as truth, it is often disturbing to the point of irritation to find that this worthy accumulation of time past is constantly being attacked by critics who repeatedly call into question this inheritance from earlier days. Such critics are frequently looked upon as destroyers or as provoking innovators. This state of things is true in many spheres of activity and perhaps will fit the situation in the realm of religious matters more than others. Or at least here the "new" and "critical" seems to cause most alarm. To meet these objectors, it may not be the best course simply to denounce the "new movement," but rather to examine earnestly the foundation of the accepted position. The English scholar, Gilbert Murray, recently in this country has given expression to this thought in his latest book, "Euripides and his Age" (1913): "And the best traditions make the best rebels. * * * There is nothing paradoxical in this. No tradition is perfect. The best brings only a passing period of peace or triumph or stable equilibrium; humanity rests for a moment, but knows that it must travel further; to rest forever would be to die. The most thorough conformists are probably at their best when forced to fight for their ideal against forces that would destroy it. And a tradition itself is generally at its best not when it is universally accepted, but when it is being attacked and broken. It is then that it learns to search its own heart and live up to its full meaning. And, in a sense, the greatest triumph that any tradition can accomplish is to rear noble and worthy rebels."

Friends' Rural Church

It has been on my mind for some time to send your paper some of my thoughts on this subject. As I have lived nearly all of my life in the country, this perhaps makes me think more about it. It has been my observation that when Friends who are farmers get ready to retire from the farm, they almost invariably move to some town where there is a Friends' meeting that is already large and flourishing. Why not move close to some country meeting where they can be of some benefit to these meetings that need their presence and financial support?

Some tell me that the town is more convenient on account of sidewalks and being close to the store, the post-office and the meat market. Why there are rural mails every day to deliver your mail right at the door; and a grocery wagon two or three times per week. A retiring farmer can afford to keep a horse and surrey, or an automobile, to go to Monthly Meeting, Quarterly Meeting or to Yearly Meeting, and go to see their friends too. Think about it, Friends, and see if the country meeting isn't the place for you.

G. G. GREEN.

Wilmington, Ohio, R. F. D. 5.

Recently in answer to a call of General Booth at a reception given for the General and Mrs. Booth at Stockholm, one hundred Scandinavians offered themselves for service in foreign lands. They will go to China, India, Ceylon, Japan, Korea, Africa and South America.

Current Items of Interest to Friends

BALTIMORE YEARLY MEETING

Quarterly Meeting Secretary.—Alonzo E. Cloud, who for a number of years has been working in the group of meetings known as Virginia Half Years Meeting and more recently as Virginia Quarterly Meeting, has recently been made the Quarterly Meeting Secretary and will soon locate in the newly occupied territory of Sedley.

Sedley, Virginia.—A series of quite helpful special meetings was held at Sedley last month in which Alonzo E. Cloud was assisted for a portion of the time each by Rufus P. King and L. Oscar Moon.

Bellefonte, Pennsylvania.—Samuel R. Neave and L. Oscar Moon were in attendance upon the meeting at Bellefonte, Pa., on the 1st ult. In the evening of the day before, L. Oscar Moon gave an illustrated lecture on English Friends which was followed by a helpful discussion.

Bethel, Virginia.—Virginia Quarterly Meeting was held at Bethel near Franklin, Va., on the 21st and 22d ult. L. Oscar Moon was in attendance and in the afternoon of the 22d spoke on "Advanced Methods in the Bible School."

Corinth Academy.—Corinth Academy, near Ivor, Va., is having a prosperous year under the principalship of C. Emmett Trueblood. They are maintaining an excellent manual training department and a regular course of agricultural lectures is available for both children and adults. These activities are making the school a valuable auxiliary to the meeting as a means of community uplift.

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING

St. Marys, Ohio.—Revival meetings began February 8th at St. Mary's, Ohio, Friends Church and continued eighteen days. Milo S. Hinckle of Lynn, Ind., was the evangelist. God's blessing was upon us from the start. Forty persons knelt at an altar of prayer. The Church was helped into a place of greater usefulness.

Tecumseh, Michigan.—A Missionary Study Class of young people has been organized at Tecumseh, Mich. For a few weeks they studied the History of Early Friends under the leadership of Mary Barrett Pim, but are now studying the immigration question under the leadership of Elwood Comfort, from the book, "Aliens or Americans."

Dublin.—Sunshine and a warming atmosphere following the severe weather was timely for Dublin Quarterly Meeting held at Dublin, February 28th. The Monthly Meetings were well represented by delegates and pastors. Lizzie Ralston Bundy, of Dunreith, was the visiting minister. The main address, delivered by Charles Elliott of Lewisville, was well received. Following a precedent established two years ago, the women of the local meeting served a substantial dinner in the class room to which the entire congregation was bidden, nearly two hundred accepting the invitation. This plan of having dinner at the Church on the occasion of the February Quarterly has added materially to the number as well as to the comfort of the attendants. The meetings represented are largely rural and widely separated. Formerly because of having to hasten home after meeting, the days being short and stormy weather so often prevailing at this season of the year, Friends were unable to accept the hospitality of local Friends.

Anderson.—Friends' Meeting at Anderson, Indiana, held revival services from February 1 to 19 inclusive. The weather was very unfavorable and the attendance small, but we feel the meeting was a great blessing to us. Dalton Lewis and wife of New Castle, Indiana, held the meetings, and the plain, practical teaching was very helpful to all who heard him. A number were converted, among them a Catholic woman, also two German girls who have grown up in our Sabbath School. They have always been a great help to us, but now their consecrated lives are shining forth for greater usefulness. Most of the number converted were young people and they wanted a Christian Endeavor organized. They met and organized on March 1st, with eighteen very enthusiastic young people as active members and several more have promised to join. Our meeting and Sabbath School have more than doubled since moving into our new Church home in September. Our pastor, Charles E. Thornburg, with his devoted wife, are serving their third year with us. They have proven to be the needed ones for this meeting. Their lives of self-sacrifice, patient service and Christian devotion have endeared them to many not Friends and also the Ministerial Association of our city.

Prof. H. P. Cook is Superintendent of our Sabbath School. He has been successful in keeping the school growing in attendance and interest. Some of the classes are organized. We maintain the cradle roll and home department in the school. A large class of young ladies taught by Hattie Dodge is a great inspiration to us all. They are constantly at work for the Church and charity. The women of our meeting keep up a very useful Aid Society and Foreign Missionary Society. For the past few months Friends have maintained a mission in West Anderson. Wesley Kelly is Superintendent of the work and great good is being done by his efforts for those needy people. Their Sabbath School held in the afternoon has an average of about forty. Our pastor holds preaching services after Sabbath School and Wesley Kelly preaches in the evening. They hold a very helpful prayer meeting each Thursday evening and a number have been converted at these meetings. Anderson Friends feel very much encouraged about our meeting.

Van Wert, Ohio.—A few weeks ago the men of this Monthly Meeting, Van Wert, Prodigal Home, Mt. Pleasant and Antioch, made arrangements for a meeting of all the men for a conference in which questions of vital interest to the Church were to be discussed. March 3d was set for the time. A committee was appointed to look after the arrangements. At once a vision seemed to come to the leaders in this movement, and it was decided that at least one hundred men should be secured for the occasion. The Ladies' Aid Society agreed to serve the banquet. Tickets were placed in the hands of a number of men, and it was soon discovered that we would have no trouble in selling the one hundred tickets. A meeting was arranged for, in the afternoon, for all the officers of the Quarterly Meeting. Ancil Ratliff was asked to take charge of this meeting and also assist in the night meeting. Charles Tebbetts was secured for the evening meeting to give a missionary address. When the time arrived for the banquet more than one hundred men had assembled and all enjoyed the sumptuous supper. It was the unanimous opinion of all who attended the occasion that it was the best thing the men of this Monthly Meeting had ever undertaken. It was decided to arrange at once for the "every member canvass" to take place some time during the month. We are looking for great results.

IOWA YEARLY MEETING

Oskaloosa.—Oskaloosa Quarterly Meeting was held at Grinnell, Iowa, February 28 and March 1. A goodly number of delegates were present on February 28. Edwin Loft, of New Sharon, was present and brought the message on Saturday morning. He took his text from I. Cor. 1:30, 31. He spoke of the life of Paul and brought some very helpful truths in regard to the Christian life. A short business meeting was held in the afternoon after which an interesting Bible School discussion was given, led by Jesse Williams, of Oskaloosa, Harry R. Keates, General Superintendent of the Iowa Yearly Meeting, brought the messages on the Sabbath. The pastor, Joseph Sopher, has been ill. He is slowly improving but unable to resume his duties yet.

KANSAS YEARLY MEETING

Stafford, Mo.—Stafford Monthly Meeting was held last Friday evening at 7:30. The building committee made a partial report. We have our improvements on our church about all done. The room added was fourteen by twenty-eight with folding doors between, which gives us room for two Sunday-school classes. This is much more convenient. We are increasing in numbers, in attendance and in interest. Ten persons from our meeting attended Quarterly Meeting at Haviland. All report a good time in the Lord. J. S. Bond and A. W. Whipple went on west and attended Glendale Meeting, north of Mullinville, and also Fowler Quarterly Meeting at Fowler.

OHIO YEARLY MEETING

Mt. Gilead.—The Mt. Gilead Meeting observed February 15th as "Go to Church Day." There was a full house and many attended who had not been there for a year or more. Daniel Whybrew closed a three weeks' revival meeting on that day, at which time there were more than thirty at the altar. Over fifty persons were definitely blessed. Brother Whybrew is a safe and sound Scriptural Evangelist and a man of much prayer and simplicity of faith that is always honored of God. The Mt. Gilead Friends have been helping recently in a union tabernacle meeting at Cardington, Ohio.

WESTERN YEARLY MEETING

Russiaville.—The meeting here has experienced another gracious visitation of the spirit. We held our special meetings in January, with Robert Pelt as Evangelist. For several weeks preceding these meetings the Holy Spirit had been working among us in an unusual way, and it was our constant purpose to honor and follow Him. As a result both preacher and people were wonderfully blessed. Night after night the gospel was preached in the power of the spirit, and blow after blow was hurled against sin in every form, yet in a loving spirit; Christ was exalted, the Holy Spirit honored and as a result many were convicted and thirty yielded themselves to Jesus Christ. The Church was strengthened and built up in a general way. There were six accessions to the Church. We praise God for sending Brother Pelt this way and bid him God's speed. A few weeks ago the Church here purchased some well located lots and expects to erect a nice modern church building in the near future. The plan is to sell the present parsonage property and erect both church and parsonage on these newly acquired lots. The outlook for the future of the meeting is good.

Bloomington, Indiana.—A very successful series of meetings led by Evangelist Robert A. Pelt, of Sheridan, and Enos Harvey, pastor, closed at this place on the night of March 5th. A crowded house greeted the leaders at the closing service. About sixty, many of them young people, claimed definite blessing, either conversion, renewal, or baptism with the Holy Spirit, while scores of others were greatly strengthened. The entire community has been stirred and has felt the uplift of this revival season.

Later.—Last night after the close of the revival meeting, I wrote a brief account of the services for this morning's mail, thinking this effort closed. But with the opening of school in the Academy this morning, there was such interest manifested that recitations were discontinued, and the time given over to evangelistic services. Robert A. Pelt and half a dozen local workers co-operated with a strong corps of Christian students, and twenty-one conversions were made before noon. Nearly the entire student body of Bloomington Academy has taken a definite stand for Christ.

WILMINGTON YEARLY MEETING

Xenia, Ohio.—During the month of February, Friends at Xenia joined with eight of the other leading churches of the city in a simultaneous evangelistic campaign. Friends were fortunate to be able to secure the services of Tilman Hobson and his daughter, of Pasadena, California, who were engaged in union revival work not far away, and who came to Xenia to assist in the campaign for souls at the Friends' Church. Mr. Hobson stood shoulder to shoulder with George C. Levering, the local pastor, and with the other local workers in our own and in the other co-operating churches and a great work has been done, not only for the Friends' Church, but also for Xenia as a whole. Mr. Hobson addressed two mass meetings of the school children of the entire city, and two large mass meetings of men on Sunday afternoon in two of the other churches. He also gave fine addresses at the opera house, besides preaching every night for three weeks at the Friends' Church. As a result, thirty-seven have asked for membership with Friends, besides sixteen, already members, who have been definitely reclaimed. The spiritual life of the entire Church, as well as of many members of other churches, has been greatly quickened.

Since coming to Xenia last fall, George C. Levering and his wife have been instrumental in organizing the ladies of the church into a Messenger Society, organized after the pattern of the Messenger Society at Winchester, Indiana. There are now thirty ladies banded together in this way for mutual acquaintance and for Christian service and new members are being added at every meeting. At the last meeting, held February 26th, one hundred and twenty-five calls were reported by the visiting committee and by the members of the society. The report of the program committee for the year was accepted and light refreshments were enjoyed by all.

The Bible School at Xenia is on the up-grade, with Herbert Davis as the efficient superintendent of the main school, and with Miss Fay Cavanaugh in charge of the primary department; the attendance and interest in all departments are on the increase. The graded lessons have recently been extended to four classes in the main school and the attendance is taxing the capacity of the building, every nook and corner being occupied. A teachers' training class meets on Wednesday evenings after prayer meeting, under the leadership of the pastor, and the boys and girls meet for a Junior Hour Sunday afternoon under the same leadership.

AMERICAN FRIEND VOLUMES

Joshua L. Bailey, of Philadelphia, will be glad to furnish complete sets (unbound) of the nineteen volumes of THE AMERICAN FRIEND, which were published at Philadelphia before being brought to Richmond last year, if some interested Friends' institution would care to have them. Perhaps some one of our colleges would be willing to have them bound for the college library. Anyone interested may address THE AMERICAN FRIEND, Richmond, Indiana.

BIBLE SCHOOL LESSON

March 22.

Subject.—Lessons By the Way.

Lesson.—Luke 13: 18-35.

Golden Text.—“Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven.”—Matt. 7: 21.

Time.—January A.D. 30.

Place.—Perea.

“The kingdom of God cometh not with observation.” Who can see the tree grow, or nature perform its functions in any line? So is the operation of God’s kingdom.

As Jesus’ ministry developed, the expectations of his disciples increased that soon the earthly kingdom was to be set up. How little they understood even yet their Master’s mission!

Jesus here goes to the heart of the matter and shows that his kingdom is within, that it works as does the leaven in the meal, that it is life producing when applied to the soul that is dead in trespasses and in sin.

In 900 years, Christianity has developed from fifty million adherents to four hundred and seventy-seven millions, and nine hundred and thirty-seven millions of people are now subject to Christian government. What better proof can there be of the vitality of the Christian faith?

But living in a Christian land does not save. The road into the kingdom is a narrow road. It is only by repentance and prayer for forgiveness that men are saved. None other can find entrance into the kingdom. The moral law cannot save. Doing penance will not save. But simple obedience and faith will bring salvation will bring salvation.

Jesus was striking again at the insincerity of the age, the hypocrisy of the people who imagined that salvation lay in the outward act, in the profession of the life, when “their hearts were far from Him.” The despised foreigners who came from every quarter of the globe with believing and sincere hearts had a better chance than the Pharisees.

It is not by appearing good, but by being good that men inherit salvation.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR

March 22.

Topic.—Our Society a Training School.—Prov. 22: 6.

The Society should be a training school—

1. To teach the members how to live the Christian life efficiently.

2. To teach the members how to pray and testify of their Christian experience, through the work of the prayer meeting.

3. To teach the members through the Lookout Committee to do personal Christian work.

4. To teach the members to become loyal adherents to the cause of temperance and good government.

5. To teach the members to be concerned about the welfare of others.

6. To teach the members how to be busy in the Church.

7. To teach the members how to pray effectively.

8. To teach the members to become interested in foreign missions.

Have each topic developed by some member of the Society.

EIGHTY-EIGHTH ANNIVERSARY

On the 4th of February, Mary Ann Hadley of Morgan County, Indiana, celebrated her eighty-eighth birthday anniversary. She has always lived in that county and is the oldest woman who is a native of that county. She has been a member of West Union Monthly Meeting ever since it was established in 1849. Members of the meeting called upon her on her birthday with good wishes and well filled baskets. After an excellent dinner had been served, short talks and reminiscences of other days were given by a number of those present.

The party broke up with hearty old fashioned Quaker hand-shakes and best wishes. Mrs. Hadley’s health is good for one of her age and her interest in Church work and especially foreign missionary work is as great as it ever was. She attends meeting whenever weather and health will permit.

THE NEW FRIENDS’ QUARTERLIES

In these days of Bible School progress, when in the making of Quarterlies there seems to be no end, it becomes necessary for the Friends to furnish one that will rank with the best or let our own publications take second place even with our own schools.

It is the plan of the Bible School Board of the Five Years Meeting to utilize the very best talent the Friends Church affords in composing a Teacher’s and an Adult Quarterly that will appeal to the best intellectual thought and deepest spiritual life in the church.

With this end in view the editors have provided a list of about thirty contributors scattered throughout the various Yearly Meetings, the following of whom have already contributed articles.

S. E. Nicholson, George H. Moore, Dr. Raymond Binford, President Edmund Stanley, H. Edwin McGrew, Harry R. Hole, Prof. Elihu Grant, Zeno H. Doan, Prof. Clarence I. Case, Arthur Jones, W. Carleton Wood, Wm. J. Sayers, Charles M. Woodman and Ellison R. Purdy.

The Board would like very much for every Bible School in the Five Years Meeting to order enough copies for at least one Adult Class and give them a fair trial. THE AMERICAN FRIEND is now our official representative paper, The Missionary Advocate informs us of the foreign field, and each of these papers should go into every Friend’s home. So also should the new Quarterlies go into every Bible School. The use of our own literature is conducive to loyalty to our own denomination, and the united Boards of the Five Years Meeting are doing their best to bring about such loyalty.

RICHARD HAWORTH,
 President Bible School Board.

LIFE’S ROAD

Smoothed by Change of Food

Worry is a big load to carry and an unnecessary one. When accompanied by indigestion it certainly is cause for the blues.

But the whole trouble may be easily thrown off and life’s road be made easy and comfortable by proper eating and the cultivation of good cheer. Read what a Troy woman says:

“Two years ago I made the acquaintance of Grape-Nuts and have used the food once a day and sometimes twice, ever since.

“At the time I began to use it life was a burden. I was for years afflicted with bilious sick headache, caused by indigestion, and nothing seemed to relieve me.

“The trouble became so severe I had to leave my work for days at a time.

“My nerves were in such a state I could not sleep and the doctor said I was on the verge of nervous prostration. I saw an adv. concerning Grape-Nuts and bought a package for trial.

“What Grape-Nuts has done for me is certainly marvelous. I can now sleep like a child, am entirely free from the old trouble and have not had a headache in over a year. I feel like a new person. I have recommended it to others. One man I knew ate principally Grape-Nuts, while working on the ice all winter, and said he never felt better in his life.”

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read “The Road to Wellville,” in pkgs. “There’s a Reason.”

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

The Westtown Letter What We Teach

The standard course of study for the various Friends' Schools within the limits of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting covers twelve years, five in the High School and seven below it. This agrees with most of the private schools of our neighborhood, and can generally be adjusted to the public school system. The eighth grade in a good public school nearly covers our first high school year.

Pupils who have done the eighth grade well, say in the upper quarter of their class, and are mature for their advancement, and of good health, can enter our Third Class and graduate in four years. And if such pupils have taken one, two, or three years of the high school, they can come to Westtown with the expectation of graduating at the same time as they would had they continued in their home school. But if the children are slow, or in poor health, or have had their schooling broken by illness, it will be generally necessary, and always advisable, to take an extra year.

There is no primary school at Westtown. The Sixth Grade of our system is our lowest class.

The school year is divided into three parts, the Fall Term, the Winter Term, and the Spring Term. The first two are nearly equal in length, and the last about one-half of the others. The intervening vacations are determined, the one by the Christmas holidays, and the other by the time of holding Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. The Spring Term of this year begins Fourth Month 27th.

It is usually best for pupils to commence a new school in the autumn, but it has often happened that they have anticipated the customary time and have begun their Westtown life in the spring. This is mainly desirable when they are out of school, or are pressed by the effort of keeping up with their classes, or when they have been much interrupted by illness. The Spring Term at Westtown will give them seven or eight weeks of country life when the outdoor interests are at their height.

Starting with the three R's and a little science, the curriculum gradually grew into a full academic course, which in 1860 overlapped the ordinary college course of that time by two full years.

It was in 1876 that the decided set of our graduates toward college began. They then completed college with two more years. Later this was lengthened to three years, and since 1900 our graduates have regularly entered the freshman class wherever they went.

In these days our graduating classes are large, averaging about fifty, and of this number about twenty go to college sooner or later. We have now regularly in college eighty of our pupils, besides a number who are taking special courses. These eighty are scattered from Massachusetts to California, mainly as follows: At Haverford, 22; Wellesley, 8; Bryn Mawr, 7; Vassar, 6; Pennsylvania State, 5; Cornell, 4; Earlham, 3; Teachers' College, New York, 3; University of Pennsylvania, 3; Mount Holyoke, 3; with one or two at each of the following: Swarthmore, Princeton, Yale, Ohio State University, Leland Stanford, etc.

They enter Haverford, Bryn Mawr and Princeton by examination, but to all the rest they are admitted by certificate.

This intimate connection with so many colleges has both a direct and an indirect effect upon the school. Those colleges which give certificate privileges follow closely our course of study, and if it is inadequate we quickly hear from them. If our pupils are poorly prepared for their examinations, the fact is known at once, and we are aware that if our certificated pupils do poorly the privilege will be withdrawn.

In an insensible, but very real way the presence in college of so many of our recent pupils is an encouragement and stimulus to us. They continually visit us and talk with their old schoolmates and teachers. They are just so many live wires down which the power of these colleges travels, and the contact gives us the thrill and energy of new life. It puts ozone into our atmosphere.

Because nearly half of our children go on to college, but sometimes do not decide to do so till their last year at school, or even after they have graduated, it is seldom wise to let anyone depart much from some regular college preparatory course. But we do have an important line of vocational training, and in the senior year there are special courses for those who expect to go at once into business. The Domestic Science for the girls includes Sewing and Cooking. We have a Sewing room, furnished with two sewing machines, and cutting tables, and other appliances. A good deal of out-of-class work is done here with the help and oversight of the teacher. The Cooking Room is admirably fitted up with a range, gas burners, and all the requirements for the work.

The boys take regular lessons in manual training, and have the use at various times of the ample and well-equipped shop. Canoe building is a favorite employment, and well-finished and serviceable craft are produced.

As stated last month, we will start in the autumn a class in agriculture, and will give the boys opportunity to do practical work under the oversight of the head of our new department of Orchards and Forests.

We recognize that vocational training in these days is rather the work of the college than of the school. Our slender lines of instruction in these subjects are introduced to arouse the interest of our children in these matters, so that they may give them ample consideration in laying out their collegiate work, as well as in choosing their professions in life.

The class in Psychology and Pedagogy is conducted with the same object. The school does not encourage the idea that anything that we can give to our pupils is a sufficient preparation for teaching. But some of them do teach as soon as they leave us, and many others wish to discover whether they have any aptitude in that direction. Both of these classes derive much profit from our course, which is conducted by the Superintendent of our Yearly Meeting system of lower schools.

How? When? Where? Why?

You ask me how I gave my heart to Christ?

I do not know;
There came a longing for him in my soul
So long ago.

I found earth's fairest flowers would fade and die,
I yearned for something that would satisfy;
And then at last somehow I seemed to dare
To lift my broken heart to him in prayer.

I do not know,
I cannot tell you how;
I only know
He is my Saviour now.

You ask me where I gave my heart to Christ?

I cannot say;
That sacred place has faded from my sight
As yesterday.

Perhaps he thought it better I should not Remember where. How I should love that spot!
I think I could not tear myself away,
For I should want forever there to stay.

I do not know,
I cannot tell you where;
I only know
He came and blessed me there.

You ask me why I gave my heart to Christ?

I can reply:
It is a wondrous story; listen while
I tell you why
My heart was drawn at length to seek his face.
I was alone, I had no resting place;
I heard of how he loved me, with a love
Of depth so great—of height so far above
All human ken,
I longed such love to share,
And sought it then
Upon my knees in prayer.

You ask me why I thought this loving Christ

Would heed my prayer?
I know he died upon the cross for me,
I nailed him there.
I heard his dying cry, "Father, forgive!"
I saw him drink death's cup that I might live;
My head was bowed upon my breast in shame,
He called me, and in penitence I came.

He heard my prayer—
I cannot tell you how,
Or when, or where;
Only I love him now.

Financing the Work of the Church

II. SEVEN OBJECTIONS TO THE ASSESSMENT PLAN OF RAISING CHURCH FUNDS

1. It cuts the nerve of voluntary benevolence. Church members are prone to look upon their annual assessments as the sufficient measure of their pecuniary obligation to the Church. When their quotas have been paid they consider themselves largely excused from making further contributions. Having gone to the limit of the Church's financial exaction, they are slow about entering upon the "second mile" of voluntary offerings. Fortunately this cannot be said of all Friends. Nevertheless it is true of a sufficiently great proportion of them to constitute a serious embarrassment in the problem of adequately financing the work of the Church.

2. The assessment plan works automatically to maintain a low church treasury. The difficulty encountered in the collection of apportionments exerts a strong pressure upon finance committees to measure appropriations, not by the importance and financial needs of the work which boards and standing committees have in hand, but by the amount of the assessments which it is supposed the subordinate meetings will stand. This false economy means a policy of withholding more than is meet which inevitably tends to inefficiency and poverty of results in all departments of church work.

3. Assessment of money has a benumbing effect upon the spiritual life of the Church. What Friend, being a faithful attender of business meetings, has never felt with discomfort the drop in the religious temperature of a congregation when financial questions have intruded themselves for settlement? The introductory season of worship may have been a veritable pentecostal occasion. An hour or two later when the financial reports were brought up and pressing demands for money were met by deficiencies in making up quotas, the spiritual atmosphere of the meeting suddenly felt the breath of a north wind followed by lengthy and desultory discussion and the feeling that the Church would be prosperous if only "money matters" could be kept out. Money raising is only an incident in the Church's work of saving souls, but it is an indispensable incident and no effort should be spared to so manage it as to raise the church temperature spiritually as well as financially.

4. The assessment of a quota supplants the pleasure of Christian privilege by the irksomeness of church duty. Few things contribute more wholesomely toward denominational loyalty and interest than the enthusiasm of concerted financial sacrifice among the members of a meeting. "When the burnt-offering began, the song of the Lord began also." When Moses built the tabernacle in the wilderness he financed the great undertaking, not by imposing an assessment upon the congregation of Israel, but by an appeal for offerings from "every man whose heart maketh him willing;" and the tide of giving from willing hearts rose so high that "the people brought much more than enough for the service of the work which Jehovah commanded them." It is a serious indictment of the assessment plan that it is liable to suppress rather than develop the benevolent spirit among church members.

5. Quota assessment favors apathy towards the claims of great Christian causes. The quota-payer who looks to his assessment to learn the amount of his pecuniary obligation to the Church is not likely to be a very devoted student of missions or of the advancement of evangelistic work or higher education. A man's hand, if held close enough to his eyes, may hide a mountain in the distance. Precisely so a quota-assessment, however small, may fill the whole horizon of a church member's benevolent outlook.

6. The assessment system, at its best, must be largely supplemented by appeals for special voluntary contributions. In some Yearly Meetings the taking up of subscriptions for the support of evangelistic, missionary, educational and other important lines of work has become a regular, and not altogether unburdensome, feature of the program at Yearly Meeting time. Under existing conditions it is difficult to see how this could well be avoided. But regular dependence to any considerable extent upon this means for financing the great activities of the Church is open to all the objections that lie against spasmodic efforts as contrasted with a well-planned, wisely ordered and steady method for promoting any permanent and worthy cause.

7. The assessment plan commits the Church to the policy of incurring heavy financial obligations in advance of resources with which to meet them. Outside church affairs this would be regarded as bad business, to say the least. In this the "sons of the light" show less wisdom than "the sons of the world."

Feeding the Multitudes

Upon two separate occasions, Christ showed His appreciation of human necessity by feeding great multitudes of people. The important feature of these two events is not the miraculous operation by which a few loaves of bread and a few small fishes sufficed to satisfy the hunger of some thousands gathered upon the hillside, wonderful as was this manifestation of Divine power. The vital element in these instances, the lesson which they teach is that Jesus had a consciousness of human need, and was ready to exercise His Divine powers for its relief, and thus establish the fact for all the ages that physical want and soul hunger are the objects alike of His solicitude and care.

Jesus did not purpose to establish an earthly kingdom. His was a government within the hearts and lives of men. But when He fed the multitudes, when He healed the sick, when He stilled the tempest He established forever the twofold obligations of the Christian life to minister to man's physical necessities as an important part of the process of nourishing his soul. He who emphasizes humanitarianism to the extent of impoverishing the spiritual life, and he who spiritualizes life to the extent of ignoring physical want, are both alike attempting to propagate an unbalanced system of religion, neither of which will stand the test of God's ideals.

If the Church has failed at any one point of measuring up to its greatest opportunities, it has failed at the point of feeding the multitudes. Ofttimes the spiritual life has been permitted to languish and die within the very confines of the Church, not to take into account the hungry multitudes outside. Too often the Church has been satisfied with setting up dogmatic standards which have made religion a mere matter of intellectual assent to certain fundamental and historic tenets, rather than a matter of real heart experience that changes the entire life of the individual and makes him a living example among men of the power of God to transform human life into an organism of spiritual power as well as of human helpfulness.

Every meeting for worship should be a time of feasting at the table of the Lord, wherein every soul is nourished and every purpose to fulfill all the obligations of Christian discipleship is strengthened. Jesus set an example not only for the Christian ministry but for Christian service of every kind, when He taught the fundamental truths of right living and the bed rock principles by which all human life is to be guided. Intellectual religion no less than a religion that expresses itself in formalism and dogmatic pronouncements is surface religion. While entertaining, it rarely touches the deepest needs of human life.

Jesus Christ must be revealed as a real, vital, living personage, who is filling the earth with His presence, ready to speak to the need of every sincere soul, if men and women are to be fed with the bread of life, if they are to be nourished and developed in spiritual things, if they are to be made rich toward God. Sermonizing is not the recital of history, that simply and only records what God has done for the past. Its real mission is to reveal Jesus Christ to the consciousness of men and women today, as One who is able to satisfy the deepest heart longings of the human race of this twentieth century. He who inspired the writing of the Scriptures, who intensified the vision of the old prophets, is in the world today ready to illuminate every heart that has a sincere purpose to know the truth.

How little has the Church comprehended the fullness of its task to live and to proclaim a religion that satisfies the soul and that ministers to the outward wants of man as well. The Church of today as well as the Church of the future must understand the relationship of religion to service, to humanitarian problems, to problems of economics, to the problems of our slums.

It is like blaming the man for the fire who turns in the alarm, to censure the man who proclaims against the sin of the city or of any human life. The important thing is to put out the fire, and give a vote of thanks to the man who gives the warning.

Let no young man forget that forgiveness is predicated upon repentance. He who is not repentant does not recognize the need of forgiveness, but he who is sorry for the sin of his life will find a Father anxious to blot out the record.

Humanity finds its dead level in its relationship to God. Whether a man be in the pulpit or in the mine, in the White House or in the factory, in the Senate or in the shop, he needs to dedicate his life to God.

"Consider Christ Jesus" Heb. 3:1

BY LUKE WOODARD

No. VIII.

His Second Coming

Among the many truths of revelation which our unaided powers could not have discovered is one which the apostle terms "that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ," usually denominated "the second coming of the Lord." It was repeatedly foretold by Christ Himself, and oftener yet by His apostles in language so unambiguous and plain as to remove all doubt and to bring it as a fact within the comprehension of ordinary minds. That we might know it was something different and distinct from His coming by His Spirit of which He also frequently spoke, we have the testimony of the "two men in shining apparel" (evidently angels), who appeared to the wondering disciples on the Mount of Olives as they beheld Him "ascend up into heaven when a cloud received Him out of their sight." "Ye men of Galilee," said they, "why stand ye gazing up into heaven; this same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven."

Not only the fact of His bodily return, but several attendant circumstances, and the purpose of this second Advent, are revealed. He is to be accompanied by His angels: "The Son of Man shall come in His glory, and all the holy angels with Him." Matt. 25: 31. This is His own utterance. Paul likewise says: "The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with His mighty angels in flaming fire." What a contrast to His first advent! Then a babe, wrapped in swaddling clothes, and lying in a manger, slighted by the world, despised and rejected of men, a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief.

When He comes again it will be "with power and great glory." It will not be in the obscurity of a stable, but, "Behold He cometh with clouds and every eye shall see Him, and they also which pierced Him." "For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west, so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be."

Another most remarkable event which is to attend the Lord's coming will be the resurrection of those who are asleep in Jesus, and succeeding this will be the translation of the living saints. "I would not have you ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep that ye sorrow not even as others which have no hope. For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him. For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord that we, which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord, shall not prevent (precede) them which are asleep. For the Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the arch angel and with the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first, then we which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air, so shall we ever be with the Lord." A similar testimony is given by the same apostle in his epistle to the Corinthians: "Behold I show you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump, for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." I. Cor. XV: 51-53.

Revelation informs us of another event connected with the Lord's coming—the destruction by fire of this earth as regards its present order as it was once destroyed by water. "There shall come in the last days scoffers, saying, where is the promise of His coming, for since the fathers fell asleep all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation; for this they willingly are ignorant of, that, by the word of God the heavens were of old and the earth standing out of the water and in the water, whereby the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished, but the heavens and the earth which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men. But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night, in which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat." II. Peter 3: 4-7, 10. This, however, must be understood of a renovation, not the annihilation of the earth, for both Peter and John speak of "new heavens and new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness."

Many at different periods have undertaken to determine the date of Christ's coming, and of the end of the world, but their many failures have served to emphasize the words of Christ: "Of that day and hour knoweth no man," etc. I do not wish to be understood as saying that a study of prophecy on this important theme is out of place; nor that the time may not be approximately determined by such study, aided by the special illumination of the Spirit, who indited the prophecies, such as the book of Daniel, Revelation, and other portions of Holy writ. I am not prepared myself to venture such a prediction, while some things seem to indicate that we are now in the closing period of this dispensation. On the one hand the "perilous times" and the "falling away" which we are told are to precede the Lord's coming, are manifesting themselves; on the other hand, the increased activity in missions makes possible the speedy accomplishment of the conditions which our Savior said would be the immediate precursor of the end: "And this Gospel of the Kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations, then shall the end come." We are not to read this as implying that all the nations will be Christianized,—the Gospel is to be preached "for a witness," making possible the salvation of those who hear, but by no means accomplishing this result in those who reject the offer. Indeed, we learn from the parable of the tares that "the children of the wicked one" will be found as a part of the human family at the time of "the harvest, which is the end of the world."

Like conditions at the time of His coming are foretold by our Savior. As it was in the days of Noah, and in the day when Lot went out of Sodom, "even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of Man shall be revealed."

The idea has been advanced by some that the apostle Paul believed that the coming of the Lord would take place in his lifetime. They base this idea on his language in I. Thes. IV: 15, where he uses the phrase: "We which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord," etc. This can hardly be considered a correct interpretation, for he expresses in the most positive way that what he was then writing was "the word of the Lord." This being the case, he was not making a false prediction. He did not presume to tell, nor did he feel authorized to tell, when the event would take place, but classing himself with believers, he spoke in a representative capacity. No one thinks the apostle James meant himself simply, when, speaking of the tongue, he said: "Therewith curse we men."

It is evident from Paul's second letter to the Thessalonians, that he did not think the second coming was imminent, although they seemed to have inferred this. He wrote the second epistle not to correct the former one, but to correct their misunderstanding of it.

The learned Dr. Adam Clarke explains this text in harmony with that which I have given: "By the pronoun we, the apostle does not intend himself and the Thessalonians to whom he was then writing; he is speaking of the genuine Christians, which shall be found on earth when Christ comes to judgment."

It seems proper in this connection to remark that the apostle uses the word sleep as a synonym of death. He nowhere in his epistles says anything that can fairly be construed to sanction the doctrine of soul-sleeping, that is, that conscious existence ends at death, and is not renewed till the body is raised. He speaks of death as a departure—"the time of my departure is at hand"; "to depart and be with Christ is far better"; "absent from the body, present with the Lord." While we should avoid speculation in regard to the intermediate state, the expressions from Paul just quoted, the vision and language of the dying Stephen; that of Christ to the dying thief; the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, afford unmistakable evidence that in the case of the saved and the unsaved there is a soul or spirit that continues in conscious existence after death. The extent to which the happiness of the saints will be advanced by the resurrection, must be left for the reality to reveal.

The purpose of Christ's Second Coming is to judge the world and to receive to Himself His own ransomed saints. "God hath appointed a day in which He will judge the world in righteousness by that Man whom He hath ordained, whereof He hath given assurance unto all men, in that He hath raised Him from the dead." "I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am there ye may be also."

Christ has given us a very sublime picture of the judgment of the Great Day: "When the Son of Man shall come in His glory and all the holy angels with Him, then shall He sit on the throne of His glory, and before Him shall be gathered all nations, and He shall separate them one from another as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats. Then shall the King say to them on His right hand, Come ye blessed of my Father inherit the Kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world, for I was an hungered and ye gave me meat, etc. * * * Then shall He say to them on His left hand, Depart from me ye cursed into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels; for I was an hungered and ye gave me no meat," etc. (The reader is referred to Matt. XXV: 31-46 for the complete account of this representation of the final judgment.)

From this we learn 1. That Christ is King and Judge. 2. That all are to appear before Him. 3. That while salvation is by grace through faith, judgment and rewards will be according to our works.—"Behold, I come quickly, and my reward is with me to give every man according as his work shall be." 4. That service rendered in true Christian love to the brethren of Christ, is reckoned as done unto Him. 5. That it was not in the performance of this service, that they became righteous, but having previously been saved by grace, they thus brought forth the fruit of righteousness. 6. That the sentence of the King as pronounced upon both the righteous and the wicked, was final and eternal.

The purpose of the revealing of these matters concerning the Second Coming of Christ, is not to gratify our curiosity, but to influence our lives, so as to be prepared for His coming, whether we are among the living or shall be removed out of time by death. Our Savior's charge comes alike to all: "What I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch. Watch ye therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of Man."

Some of His parables are directed to this end. That of the ten Virgins teaches us to make timely the needful preparation watching unto prayer, so as not to be surprised if the Bridegroom comes at an unexpected hour.

The parable of the talents teaches our responsibility according to our capacity, and our opportunities, and that with unequal privileges with equal diligence, there will be equal rewards.

The parable of the pounds teaches that with equal privileges, and with unequal diligence, there will be unequal rewards.

Whether the events connected with the Lord's coming as mentioned by Paul, and those foretold by Peter, will be simultaneous, the right attitude of the Christian is not that of indolent waiting for His coming but one of cheerful and diligent performance of His manifested will. "Seeing ye look for such things, be diligent, that ye may be found of Him in peace, without spot and blameless."

We should beware of lending a willing ear to the enchanting strains of the world's gay pipe, lest, in such an hour as we think not, we be startled by a blast of the trumpet of the archangel.

The Challenge of Today

BY ZENO H. DOAN

We live in a day when the door of the world has been opened wide, and stands as a call to the forces of Christianity to enter. For a long time we have recognized, in a half-hearted way, the utter impotency of non-Christian religions to meet the needs of humanity, but the difficulties which were in the way, and must be overcome were urged as an excuse for our failure.

For fifty years, God has been working in a variety of ways that have made this old position untenable. The increased and increasing facilities of travel has brought us close to the hearts of men and women in the darkness of heathenism, until we've come to know the awful degradation of those who live far removed from the light of the gospel of Christ. We have been shown the actual working systems of religion, hoary with age, but absolutely lacking in the essential element of redemption—a heart throbbing with compassionate love and sympathy. No tears for the sorrowing, no ministering hand for the suffering, no hope for the dying. Only the darkness of gloom and despair.

As this change has been going on whereby God has let us see the inadequacy of these religions, political changes have been taking place, until the messenger of the cross is under the protection of so-called Christian nations wherever he may go. As steam and electricity has brought the world close together, civilized nations, recognizing the value of Christianity, have spread their hands protectingly over the whole earth, saying to the ignorant and idolatrous, "These are your friends and messengers of hope, who must not be harmed."

God has also been letting those in darkness see the difference there is in the conditions of life that surround men and women in Christian and non-Christian lands; thus breaking down the barrier of race and superstition which had held them in bondage for centuries, and sending hundreds of their young men and women into our land to equip themselves, intellectually and industrially, for the marvelous changes that are to be wrought in the regions from whence they came.

While all this has been going on, a new life and potency has been breathed into the "Great Commission," by the host of young men and women, trained in our colleges and universities, who are heralding as their battle-cry, "The world for Christ in this generation," with such effectiveness that the best intelligence of the business world is setting itself the task of so financing the Kingdom so as to make possible the realization of this battle-cry.

To be alive in such an age ought to make the blood of every follower of Jesus Christ tingle to his fingertips. How it presses upon us the claims of stewardship. To be an individual in the conflict, to be a religious organization in hours such as these ought to draw us together with a common purpose, and send us forward with a single impulse.

As Friends, we must resolutely face the situation as it is, and take our place in the present alignment, and help press the battle to its conclusion, or find ourselves forced to the rear as stragglers who have lost their place either because of fear or else because of inability or unwillingness to accept the challenge of a great opportunity. All the history and tradition of our ancestors calls us to the conflict. Personal identification of the individual with Jesus Christ in service for the sake of humanity, was the dominant trait of character in the lives of those whose followers we are. How shall we meet the crisis?

The New Plans for Mission Study

BY CHARLES E. TEBBETTS

I am afraid Friends are not realizing the splendid outline now provided for awakening the Church to a new interest in missions. At last the entire missionary forces of North America have developed a plan for effectual education in every congregation that exceeds everything previously used. It is prepared by a Committee made up of the most experienced leaders in that line of work of all our Boards, both Home and Foreign, both men's and women's. It is a plan not only for the present, but to be carried out after a definite plan through the coming years. It provides for two year-periods,—one culminating at Easter for Foreign Missions, and one at Thanksgiving for Home Missions. The one entitled "The New Era in Missions" that is now on excels in interest, I think, even the Livingstone campaign of last year. It is designed to run through three months through every department of the church, the crowning service being the Easter Sunday School program entitled "The Triumph of Christ." This is the most interesting program I have ever seen. It is now too late to get in all the department preparatory work before Easter, but if undertaken at once enough can be done to secure a most interesting Easter program, and the rest of the work can be completed later.

The plan provides for two sermons, four prayer meeting services of the church, and four for the young people's meetings, and six exercises for Bible Schools occupying ten or fifteen minutes each. These were intended to run through the three months, but can be concentrated in a shorter period if desired. Complete plans for each of these services are provided, with many of the exercises given in full. The complete set can be had for ten cents, postpaid. The programs with exercises complete for the Easter service will be sent postpaid for $1.50 per hundred or twenty-five cents per dozen. There should be sufficient of these so that all who sing can take part in the songs and hymns. They are not designed for a few to do it all, but for the entire school to take part in the singing and responsive readings, with special recitations for the younger pupils. For the necessary information for the sermons and department exercises two books should be provided: "The New Era in Asia," 58 cents, postpaid, and "The World Call to Men of Today," 30 cents, postpaid. For the very best results there should be a Mission Study Group meeting once a week for eight weeks to study "The New Era in Asia." It portrays the most wonderful advance movement in the history of the church since the Apostolic age. Where this is done enough books should be ordered so every member of the group can have access to a copy for preparation.

In addition to these books the following books should be in libraries accessible to all our members. They are all recent books of exceeding interest: "The Emergency in China," "Mexico Today," for adult readers. For young readers the following are as fascinating as any fiction: "Ann of Ava," "The Black Bearded Barbarian," "Under Marching Orders," "Uganda's White Man of Work," "Livingstone the Path-finder." Each of these is 58 cents in cloth postpaid. Paper covered copies can be had for 43 cents, but these are books for wide reading and paper covers do not last.

Besides the outlines mentioned above there are plans for three fine entertainments in costume and dialogue. One represents a Korean village (five copies required, 15 cents each); one a Moslem pilgrimage to Mecca (twelve copies required, 25 cents each); and one a scene in home life in China (seven copies required, 25 cents each). There is still another representing a scene at a Mission Station in Africa (fifteen required, 25 cents each).

Plans are already being perfected for similar educational campaigns for next year. No church can afford to let this opportunity pass, and fail to get in line for these programs as they shall be hereafter provided regularly each year. If the whole program cannot be undertaken, most of its features can be used without more time and effort than any congregation can easily give. There is nothing difficult about it.

A Call to Prayer by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America

To the Churches of Christ in America:

In the name of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, in accordance with instructions from the Executive Committee, we send forth, during this appropriate season of the year, this call to united intercession, earnestly requesting every pastor to lead his congregation in prayer:

That the spirit of Christian unity may be rapidly deepened in all the churches, through the quickened consciousness of the presence of Christ in the hearts of His disciples; that as they all draw closer to Him they may be drawn closer to one another and may realize in Him the one center of union of faith and life;

That the Spirit of God may fill the churches with evangelical fervor and zeal, to the end that through a larger faith and a deeper realization of the need of regeneration in the lives of men, there may come such consecration to spiritual service as shall bring the people to the feet of Christ;

That the united power of the Christian churches may be Divinely guided in the work of carrying the Christian gospel to heathen lands; the practice of Christian brotherhood to those who come to our shores from other countries, with an earnest effort to bring them to Christ; the effective distribution and development of religious forces in home mission fields; the deepening of Christian sentiment against the liquor traffic, individual and social impurity, and all the other evils of human society; the restoration and the conservation of a true Christian Sunday such as shall preserve both the physical and the spiritual life of the people; a larger earnestness in the religious education of our youth; the spiritual interpretation of marriage, the family and the home; the realization of a just and humane social order through the development of a Christian democracy; a spirit of brotherhood which will bring everlasting peace among all the nations of the world; and as the sole means to all these ends, the cultivation of that spiritual life and passion which come through a knowledge of the heart and mind of Christ, and the acknowledgment of His divine nature and sovereign power.

Is There to Be a Revival of Lay Evangelism?

It is encouraging to note what seems to be the birth of a new passion for gospel witnessing upon the part of Christian laymen. This seems especially marked in the West. In Kansas gospel teams under the leadership of Mr. Henry J. Allen, editor of the Wichita Beacon and Progressive Party candidate for governor, have made a sensation over a wide territory. In Washington such Western senators as Clapp of Minnesota, Kenyon of Iowa, Norris of Nebraska, and Ashurst of Arizona are preaching lay sermons frequently in the pulpits near the Capitol. Recently, it is reported, an Ohio farmer, converted a year ago in a "Billy" Sunday meeting, addressed a crowd of horse breeders, attending a school of their profession in Kansas City. He told the men that he was not asking them to join any Church, but that their hearts were full of sin and that they needed to get rid of it. At the close of this appeal fifty men rose to their feet, some in tears, all deeply moved. Vice-President Marshall is reported as having lately said: "In my judgment, the first blush of dawn is already apparent on the horizon of the world's spiritual day."—Northwestern Christian Advocate.

A Monthly Meeting Chronicle

BY JUNIUS JUNIOR

X.

October had come with its ripening fruit, and the chill of the autumn was in the air. But Slow Valley Monthly Meeting had no chill except the chill of an unnatural conservatism and a fealty to old time custom that still came to the surface now and then at unexpected moments. A few of the wise ones, however, were beginning to realize that this conservatism was not without its blessing, for even an engine with its tremendous power needs a balance wheel for its own protection. It was only when this conservatism actually persisted in blocking meritorious and vitally progressive changes, that it had to be dealt with firmly but kindly, in order that the meeting might be allowed to go forward into a higher life and into new and wider fields of Christian service.

The attendance reached high water mark for a monthly meeting session, and out of 139 resident members (the hand of death having been laid upon three of the congregation within recent weeks), 109 were in attendance. The Committee on visitation and welcome was still getting in its work, and reported that since the September meeting a total of 137 family visitations among the membership had been reported to the Committee. The spirit of fraternity had broken into a flame, and Slow Valley meeting was rapidly becoming a great family with common interests and a common passion for the community.

The Committee to visit the new applicants for membership reported favorably upon each case, and after a hearty welcome had been extended, the Recorder was directed to add the name of each of the eight to the membership roll. As a result of the continued family visitation, there were four more applications for membership, and a letter was read for a newly married couple who had just moved to Newtown.

The Clerk reported that he had followed the direction of the meeting in sending a letter of greeting to each of the non-resident members, except two whose addresses could not be found. Replies had been received from eleven, ten of whom expressed their hearty allegiance to Friends' principles and thanked the meeting for its interest in their behalf. The other one was away from Friends and had recently joined the United Brethren Church. Two others signified their willingness to have their rights of membership transferred to another monthly meeting not far away, and action was taken accordingly.

The Committee having in charge the question of the foreigners in Newtown reported that after some investigation, it was made clear that no one denomination could deal with the problem satisfactorily. As a result of invitations sent, there had been two conferences between the Committee and like appointees from the other churches of the city. After full discussion it had been agreed to create a Board of management for the mission consisting of one from each of the local churches, which Board was to take charge of the mission and reorganize it upon a permanent basis, subject to the approval of all the churches. It was also finally agreed that a sub-committee of the joint Committee should investigate thoroughly the conditions among the foreign element for the guidance of the managing board.

The report provoked a lively discussion, resulting in the approval of the plans suggested, but not until considerable opposition had been voiced. The old cry of economy played considerable part in the discussion, and there were those who freely said that the meeting would have enough to do to take care of itself. There were many, however, who urged that the only way by which the meeting could grow and prosper was to have an interest beyond its own circle, which would stir them to action in behalf of others.

The Committee on internal relationships revived the subject of the financial system of the meeting. For more than an hour the debate went on; some contending for the present assessment plan, others advocating the envelope plan of voluntary giving after an every-member canvass had been made. Testimonials were read from other places where the proposed plan was in operation, showing an increased income because more persons were giving and were giving regularly and systematically.

It was finally proposed and adopted that the matter be further considered at the November meeting, with a view to adopting the envelope plan of collection, beginning with the first of the year. If adopted it was agreed that during November a tentative canvass of the members should be made, to be followed by a more thorough canvass in March in accordance with the plans of the United Mission Campaign.

It was reported that the new Christian Endeavor Society was growing both in interest and in members, and that the young people apparently had the burden of the meeting upon their hearts in a way that was truly encouraging.

The Bible School Committee reported an estimate of $875.00 for a new addition for the Primary Department. In a supplemental report, it said that the contractors had found the condition of the roof bad and that for $300.00 additional an up-to-date roof could be put on with some other needed repairs. One thousand one hundred and seventy-five dollars was a huge sum, and there were those who balked in the face of it. The merchant and the farmer, however, proposed that a subscription be taken in the face of the meeting, and to the surprise of everybody $892.00 was raised within twenty minutes. The advocates of the every-member canvass were so confident that the balance would soon be forthcoming, if the new financial plan were approved, that the meeting finally endorsed the project, and appointed a building Committee to have the work undertaken at once.

The Committee further reported that the need of a Bible School at the Bennett school house was so apparent that, although winter was coming on, it was felt that with a little help the school could be maintained. Three of the young men and two of the young women had obligated themselves to see that the work was begun and carried on. This provoked another discussion, for there were some faint-hearted ones, but the progressive spirit had its way, and the meeting directed the opening of the school a week later under the care of the Bible School Committee.

The concluding minute was read, and after prayer by the resident minister, the congregation dispersed, but not until there had been many hearty handclasps expressive of brotherly interest, and numerous social visitations throughout the meeting house in which the enlarged program of the meeting was the chief topic of consideration. Slow Valley Meeting was still headed on the upgrade.

A Beautiful Tribute to a Worthy Couple

BY CHARLES E. TEBBETTS

I find the following in the West Branch (Iowa) Times. A host of former pupils and associates of Joel and Hannah E. Bean will heartily enter into a feeling of deep sympathy with this beautiful tribute. I was one of the fortunate group who came under their care in my first schooling away from home, as well as in the closer intimacy of their sweet home life for over half a century. Outside of my own home, no influence so much as theirs has had the shaping of my own life and character. The following is the quotation:

"From far off Hawaii has flashed the message that one dearly loved by many in our community has passed on to his eternal rest, and we deeply mourn the loss of a true friend and life-long teacher.

"Together with the host of those who loved him, not only in our own land, but also in Great Britain and the Islands of the sea, we drop the tears of mourning because his beautiful life is taken from us,—a life that has meant so much to our own in inspiration and uplift.

"In the earlier days of the life of our neighborhood, many of us were privileged to come under the teaching of this noble man of God, and his no less noble wife. Of these I am sure I voice the sentiment when I say that no other influence outside the home was so potent in moulding our characters and fixing our best ideals. From the schools which they taught in those long gone years, many men and women have gone out into the world whose lives have been a blessing to the communities in which they lived, and who have ever carried in their hearts a grateful reverence to the dear teachers who directed them into the way of truth.

"To those as well as to many to whom they ministered in church, or in the Bible School, or in the generous hospitality of their own home, the memory of Joel and Hannah Bean will ever be held sacred and dear. They taught in the public schools of West Branch for several years; they also taught a private school in a building they had erected for that purpose in their own yard. They were very faithful and efficient ministers of the Gospel in all these years, and their loving ministry to our lives has never ceased—indeed can never cease so long as life endures—for their sweet influence, which has helped us on our way from childhood, will not desert us, but continue to reach and touch our lives with gentle urgings to higher endeavor and purer living.

"Five years ago the beautiful spirit of Hannah Bean went softly and suddenly away to God—just as she had hoped the end might come. Since her departure her dear husband has lingered on, a benediction and inspiration to every life he touched. Fitting it is that his last earthly days should be passed in the beautiful island which he so loved and for the spiritual development of whose people he gave a part of his best years of labor. Here his dear life ebbed away, and his purified spirit passed gently into the Father's presence."

Will Money Buy Peace?

BY EMORY J. HAYNES

It has not been Mr. Carnegie's practice to include the church in his benevolences, either as beneficiary or trustee. It would doubtless be impertinent to judge of his religious beliefs by this fact. Not all the real Christians are in the church by any means. It is an old saying that not all in the church are real Christians. The sudden and wholly unexpected turning of this man to the church as the almoner of fresh millions of his wealth is an interesting event. Did he encounter any declinations? Was there any religious body of representative size that preferred not, in the person of any of its clergy, to act on his new peace board?

Not that it matters at all, for the eminent and devout men who are to be the trustees are assurance of the utmost possible efficiency in administering this vast sum to promote peace in the world. It is a fact, however, that a considerable number of religious, and even philosophic people think Mr. Carnegie places undue faith in dollars. Dollars rightly seem to him as very potent. He has recently said he expects to see universal peace before he dies. And if more money is needed to force the victory at once he logically puts down the money squarely on the world's counter. Why not? Let us buy this great good at once, and done with it.

Away back of war, however, is the bad human heart. The very old evils of pride, envy, the selfish love of power and gold, anger, malice, evil passions, these are the causes of war. The Church has been working for centuries to cure the evils at the source.

So courageous and infectious, however, are these evils that the Church itself has been often made ill by them, and thereby too frequently presents herself as most unlovely. Fire often kindles upon the very garments of the fire fighters. No wars have been so dreadful as religious wars. No fights are so unseemly as "church fights."

Nevertheless the Church of the ages is the only institution that will finally prevail against war. Steadily, one by one, she will teach men the story of the Prince of Peace. The changed human heart is her mission. She has no other mission. For heaven is best prepared for by being here and now a man of loving heart and just.

The clergy are to use these two million dollars to persuade themselves to greater eloquence for peace? Impossible. Is it to further the urgency and frequency of the presentation of the particular theme, world-wide peace? Hardly so, for it would be difficult to find a preacher who ever advocates anything else. Certainly in America, except for patriotic wars, the voice of the pulpit is uniformly for peace among men. From the Sunday schools the almost countless millions of children pour forth each Sunday, taught forgiveness, patience, mercy, pity. The malevolent affections that cause war are dissuaded even with hymns and all evangels.

Let Mr. Carnegie build more churches. Let him plant a church in every rural valley. Let him found a church opposite his library in every village that lacks one. It has been, for twenty years, the struggle of the Methodists to build a new church every day in the year. Yet they cannot keep pace with the demand. The same marvelous effort is the record of other denominations. It matters not the name. The established sanctuary, of any name, is the peace agency that he may rely on.

Money will not regenerate this world. Let us suppose a round billion were bestowed at once for the holy purpose of making all men unselfish. If it would mark the end no doubt the money could be easily raised. But things human do not work that way.

Universal peace cannot be bought outright. For there is no one place where it is on sale. It is a product of each man's own heart. Each man is to be got at. A conservatory may make a few flowers grow, by warming a few roots. But June is what makes flowers grow. There must come over all lands the great wave of moral and spiritual warmth that turns man savagery to loving kindness. Whatever helps to bring the universal June helps to bring international peace.

It does honor to his heart when any man flames with holy zeal to right any one great wrong, when his impatience becomes imperious and he vows to devote even his very life to bring immediate victory for the right. But not even the martyr's death is enough. There have been hosts of blessed martyrs, yet the golden age creeps slowly and tarries long.

Certainly then the good man's gold must expect the same tardiness. Consecrated gold helps, like the consecrated blood drops of martyrs. But the end is not yet. The date is not in the almanac. War will not cease in the world till it ceases in man's own soul. And that means the triumph of religion.—N. Y. Evening Mail.

The federal council of Methodism, composed of official commissioners from the northern and southern branches, met recently at Nashville. They spent their time settling difficulties and did not get to the question of Church union.

An Evangelistic Trip in Cuba

On January 19th I had the privilege of going into the territory between Holguín and Gibara to conduct some special services. There are three out-stations in this immediate neighborhood, Auras, Boças and Velasco, and one some distance away, Santa Lucia, all cared for by José Reyes, a conscientious Christian man and an indefatigable worker.

I met him and also Sylvester Jones on the train and we proceeded at once to Velasco. There the Mission owns a well located lot with a palm house on it, which is at present used for the services. The first night there was very good attendance and interest. The next day Sylvester Jones returned to his work at Gibara and José Reyes and I continued the meetings. The days were spent in family visiting and prayer and the meetings were at night. The attendance and interest increased during the week and on Friday night about fourteen stood up to thus express their repentance and a desire to accept and follow Christ.

On Saturday the teachers at Gibara, Misses Pretlow and Ratliff, came with a folding organ to help in the meetings over Sunday. The Cuban is very fond of music, so the last two nights the house was packed, about 80 being crowded into the small room. On the last night about 25 stood up in response to a call similar to the one made on Friday. This number included most of the same ones who stood up before. A few signed candidates' cards for admission to the Church.

On Monday the teachers returned to their school and we went to Auras for a week's campaign. There the Mission built a neat chapel about four years ago. We found a goodly number of regular attenders and the meetings were held with good attendance and attention till Friday night. May M. Jones and a Cuban young lady came down from Gibara on Thursday to help with the meeting and to play the organ one night. The meetings were very similar to those at Velasco and the results were about the same. José Reyes had one children's meeting at each place and the women Friends also did the same. The children attend well and are responsive to the teaching.

I had the privilege about ten years ago, in company with Sylvester Jones and a Cuban young man, of making one of the first evangelistic tours through this region. Of course we had large crowds then for it was a new thing, but in these last meetings I saw the manifestations of a deep and abiding interest in our work, as well as evidences of the moving of the Holy Spirit in their hearts.

About nine years ago, while residing at Holguín, I was permitted to begin regular work at Auras and to carry it on for three years. I could see a great improvement in the attitude of the people towards the work and in their attendance at the services. When I began the work it was often difficult to get the ladies to attend the place of worship. In groups of two or three they would pass and repass the door waiting for some one to be the first to enter. I often had meeting with none but men and boys. Now they enter with all confidence and take their places as though accustomed to do so.

My heart was also rejoiced one day by hearing some one singing a hymn in a neighboring house. How much the dear old Gospel Hymns have meant to us! I believe they may mean as much to Cuba. The trip was a great encouragement and blessing to me. We see so much sin and coldness and indifference that they become depressing in their influence, yet we see that God is working and is calling out for Himself a people.

CHAS. C. HAWORTH.

Banes, Ote., Cuba.

Why Such an Exodus?

You may think the only Exodus was the Exodus of the Children of Israel out of Egypt, led by Moses, but you are mistaken. Every Sunday morning there is an Exodus from the church just at the hour of public worship. Multitudes of children and older young people go flocking out, many times encouraged in the Exodus by their parents, or at least not actively encouraged by you to stay for the church service. Perhaps, father and mother, you have not thought of it in that light. But really and truly now, how many of you encourage your children to stay for church? And you, Sunday-school teacher, do you talk to your children about the church service and encourage them to stay? Try it awhile. The pastor would love to have the children in the church service.

Some people labor under the mistaken notion that it is too much to expect the children to stay for church. If we hold such a notion we are not consistent when we require them to attend the public schools for a much longer period of time each day and for more days in the week. It is said that "the Sunday-school is the church of tomorrow." If there is any truth in this statement, and we believe there is, what kind of a church will the church of tomorrow be, if our children get in the habit of deserting the church service at the close of the Sunday-school hour? We must not only train up our children in the way they should go, but we must go that way ourselves.

We love our children and desire best things for them, but are we giving the best to them when we permit them to acquire such bad habits with regard to church attendance? The pastor drops this word of exhortation and warning to the parents, teachers and officers of the Sunday-school, concerning this growing tendency of our time.—The Silent Evangel.

Burial of the Scriptures

A most interesting service occurred at Philadelphia last week, attended by 10,000 Jews, when the rabbi buried the scrolls of the "Mosaic Law," a ceremony probably never before witnessed in America. The Torah, consisting of fifteen parchment sheets and bearing the writings of Moses, had been partially consumed by fire some weeks before at the burning of the synagogue. A tradition as old as history itself declares that when any harm befalls the sacred scrolls, Israel is doomed to destruction unless the wrath of divine providence is appeased by a proper burial of the documents. Accordingly, the patriarchs of the orthodox Jewish community assembled at the ruins and, gathering around the bits of the Torah that still remained, offered prayers that their people might be saved. Women wept as their husbands and fathers repeated the Ten Commandments and prepared the Torah for its burial. As many as could be accommodated within the walls were allowed to pause for a moment before the remains of the shrine. Crowds five times as great remained outside and recited the "Kaddish," the Jewish prayer of mourning.—Northwestern Christian Advocate.

Sunshine Further On

The mountain's base is wrapped in gray,
And chill and cheerless is the way,
As slow I tread the shadowed trail
That stretches upward still and pale.
But as I rise I see it glow
With what seemed mist and cloud below,
And soon I stand amid the dawn
Of warmth and sunshine—farther on.
O, soul that beats the shadowed air
About the base of summits fair,
Be brave and patient. Mists obscure
The lower way, but hold secure
The higher path. For thou must rise
On toiling wings to clearer skies,
And though the way seems dull and gray,
It lightens toward the summit day.
Thou, too, shalt stand amid the dawn
That flowers in sunshine—farther on.

Notice

Thomas Jones, who has been appointed as Secretary of the Young People's Activities of the Five Years Meeting, is to assume the office the first of April. According to the arrangement made with the Executive Committee of the Board, he is to continue his seminary course and direct the work during the school term, from Hartford, Connecticut. He will devote all of his time to young people's work during the summer vacation.

Thomas Jones is a talented and consecrated young man. Having been a loyal Christian Endeavorer all his life he is in thorough sympathy with our young people and their problems.

For plans and suggestions, address him at Hartford Seminary, Hartford, Connecticut.

W. O. TRUEBLOOD,

Chairman Board of Young People's Activities.

It is not, after all, a question of the quantity of what we do, but the quality of it. God knows of how poor stuff our dreams and deeds are woven; but if it is the best we can give, if we desire with all our hearts what is noble and pure and beautiful and true—or even desire to desire it—He will accept the will and purify the deed.—A. C. Benson.

Current Items of Interest to Friends

BALTIMORE YEARLY MEETING

Corinth, Virginia.—Howard M. Hoge, of Lincoln, Virginia, was in the meeting at Corinth in the forenoon of the 8th ultimo, at Berea Mission in the afternoon, and at Sedley, Virginia, in the evening. His addresses were much appreciated since he spoke on the subject of temperance at a time when the state-wide prohibition campaign was on in the Virginia Legislature.

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING

Wabash.—The mortgage that has been standing on this church for seven years went up in flames Sunday morning, March 8th. We had a fine Quarterly Meeting.

IOWA YEARLY MEETING

Des Moines.—Des Moines Quarterly Meeting of Friends was held March 7th and 8th in the Friends' Church of Des Moines. Saturday morning the first session was for Ministry and Oversight, and then the meeting for worship in which Charles Moore, pastor, of Indianapolis, gave the message. His subject was Prayer. Lunch was at 12:00 o'clock. In the afternoon sessions, business came first and then the conference on "The Church and its Community." The address was given by W. Irving Kelsey, professor of the Biblical department of Penn College, followed by a discussion. The thought was, if each one would work in his own community, greater things might be accomplished in the work of the Lord. On Sunday at 10:30 the meeting for worship was held, and the sermon was preached by Harry R. Keates, superintendent of Iowa Yearly Meeting; at 12:00 o'clock the Bible School was held, and at 12:30 dinner was served in the dining-room.

Bible School Conference: Address, Viola Smith, Field Secretary Bible School Board Iowa Yearly Meeting. Discussion led by O. F. Comford. Special conference of Officers and Teachers of Bible School conducted by Viola Smith. Evening session, address to the young people of the Quarterly Meeting by W. Irving Kelsey. Closing sermon by Viola Smith. Concluding minute, C. V. Stanley. Sunday was "Everybody Go to Church Day" in Des Moines. There was a large congregation to enjoy all the sessions of the Quarterly Meeting.

Honey Creek.—On February 1st, Elgie L. McCargar, an Evangelist from Oskaloosa, assisted by our pastor, Anna

Smith, with Melvin Smith, her husband, who is also a minister, commenced a series of meetings at Honey Creek, which closed the 25th. Sin with its dreadful effects in this life, and the awfulness of eternal punishment in the life beyond, were forcibly shown in a spirit of love and tenderness. Also the blood of Jesus Christ as the only remedy for sin, the blessings of a Christian life here and an eternal life of blessedness in that beautiful place, Heaven, were just as faithfully presented, which resulted in twenty-four being definitely blessed, either in conversion, renewal or sanctification, and the Church greatly strengthened. As an appreciation of the labors of Brother McCargar the membership together with others who attended, presented him a free-will offering of $100.00. Money for new lights for the church and a study lamp for our pastor, was donated the same way. We feel that the hand of our God has been good upon us, and we give Him the glory.

KANSAS YEARLY MEETING

Kansas City, Missouri.—February was full of good things. The 1st was "Go to Church" Sunday, and we had the largest congregation we have ever had, and a fine spirit manifest. The 8th was Gospel Team day in Kansas City. Judge Stanley, of Wichita, told us how he had been led to Jesus Christ. On the 15th, the older boys held the reins. We were surprised and delighted to have President Albert J. Brown, of Wilmington College, Ohio, with us on the 22d. We all enjoyed the singing after dinner, the 5th. And the neighborhood entertainment of the 19th was the best ever.

Gate, Oklahoma.—Gate Quarterly Meeting was held at Laurence Academy, Gate, Oklahoma, February 27 to March 1. No visiting ministers were present, but profitable and interesting meetings were held. On Saturday night a missionary program was given. Among those taking part were Mae Smith, Harvey Lupton, Adelle Laverty, Walter Lewis and Earl Alkire. This meeting was one of a series of missionary-evangelistic programs which have been given at different points in the Quarterly Meeting during the winter.

NEW ENGLAND YEARLY MEETING

East Lynn.—On February 23d a sunrise prayer meeting was held in the East Lynn Friends' Chapel, East Lynn, Massachusetts, at 8:00 o'clock. The Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor were the originators of this early meeting, and the Endeavorers were invited to join in this service. The leaders for the meeting were Lyndon H. LaRouche Vice-President of the Society and Richard S. Holmgren. Jennie W. Crosman was one of the speakers, and Miss Pote, President of the First United Church Endeavor Society of Swampscott, gave a very interesting talk on Efficiency. The young people's chorus furnished some of the music, and Richard Holmgren gave a talk on Washington. The Lord greatly blessed us in the service. In the evening of the same day, a very enjoyable Washington Social was held in the church, given by the Quaker Club, a missionary organization of the church. The church was decorated very prettily and refreshments were served by the officers of the club, Miss Mabel Holmgren, Miss Julia Austafson, Miss Edith LaRouche and Miss Ethel Stewart. These young ladies deserve great credit for their work.

NORTH CAROLINA YEARLY MEETING

Greensboro.—The meeting at Greensboro, North Carolina, is making substantial progress in all its departments of work. The Men's Bible Class recently gave a banquet for all the men of the church. A number of short addresses on live topics were given and a good social hour was enjoyed by all. The report of the treasurer shows that the amount given and pledged for foreign missions this year reaches a high-water mark in our missionary activities. The Bible School is growing in numbers and interest. At present there is a friendly contest between the men and women of the school for new members. The Christian Endeavor is proving to be one of the most active and spiritual forces of the church; they hold regular meetings at the county jail and the county farm, supplying flowers for the sick and shut-ins, and many other kinds of practical Christian work. Last quarter they won the City Union banner by more than twenty points in the efficiency campaign, and are now the banner society of the city. They have added more than twenty-five new members within the last four months. The Sabbath evening services have been strictly evangelistic, wherein quite a number have renewed their covenant with God. Several new members have been taken into membership at the last three Monthly Meetings.

David Sampson and Wife.—David E. and Sarah M. Sampson, who sailed from New York on the 18th of February, report a very favored voyage, having passed Queenstown on the 25th. They regard it as a special providence at this very stormy season. The only discomfort was Mrs. Sampson's sea sickness.

WILMINGTON YEARLY MEETING

New Burlington.—On Sabbath evening, February 1, 1914, Abijah E. Wooten, pastor of Waynesville meeting, began a series of meetings at this place. On Thursday, the 5th, he was joined by Samuel Mosher, of Cardington, Ohio, who for two weeks assisted him both in song and ministry of the work. The meetings closed March 1st, after a season of great benefit to the church and community. There were twenty conversions and renewals and four accessions to the church. Many have been helped and encouraged to better living by the earnest presentation of the Gospel by these ministers who spared not themselves that the way might be made plain. During the meeting Mr. Wooten's family was quarantined at their home with scarlet fever. The case proved a light one, however.

WESTERN YEARLY MEETING HOUSE

The Plainfield Friends occupied their new house of worship for the first time Sabbath, March 8th. The services were largely attended and were most inspiring and profitable throughout. A most beautiful spirit of Christian unity and fellowship was shown when the Methodist, Baptist and Christian churches voluntarily dismissed their congregations to join with their sister church in her opening service. There was special music by the choir and the men's chorus, the latter composed of twelve men from the different church organizations of the town.

Willard O. Trueblood, pastor of First Friends Church, Indianapolis, delivered the message at the morning service, using the text "In this place is one greater than the temple." (Matt. 12: 6). The sermon was indeed an excellent one and one in which Christ was held up as Lord over all. E. James Carter, pastor of the local church, and T. F. Williams, pastor of the M. E. Church, assisted in the services. At the evening meeting Brother Trueblood delivered a most powerful address on Peace.

He declared that the dream of the dreamers is coming true, and that soon international warfare will be an impossibility. The congregation which will continue to meet in this new house of worship feel that they have a building of which they should be proud and which should inspire them to a greater loyalty and better living. The trustees of the local meeting have arranged and are meeting with good success in raising the necessary funds to meet the added expense determined by the Yearly Meeting trustees for the extras to the room for its special benefit and also for its per cent. of entire building.

THAT CONFERENCE OF MEN

Quarterly Meeting Endorses It

Bangor Quarterly Meeting was held at Marshalltown, Iowa, February 28th. This meeting endorses the call for a Conference of Men, and renews the invitation to meet in Iowa. Let us all remember that however valuable opinions and discussions may be, real waiting upon God for His plan and purpose means vastly more, both before and during the sessions of such conferences.

ANNA W. MARSHALL.

Recording Clerk.

Another Endorsement

Were we at a business meeting of the church, and if the topic of "that Conference for Men" were under discussion,

I should accord a hearty "so do I" to the remark of "a young Friend" in the issue of February 19th. By all means have the conference. It will mean big things I am sure.

BERNICE E. HAWKINS,
New Burlington, Ohio.

Another Meeting Endorsement

At the March session of Sandwich Monthly Meeting, held at West Falmouth, Massachusetts, the proposition of a Men's Conference to discuss the problems now facing the church and to suggest plans for successful and aggressive work was most heartily endorsed.

LOIS H. BOWERMAN,
Clerk for the day.

EARTHQUAKE IN CUBA

GIBARA, CUBA, March 1, 1914.
Editor of The American Friend,
Richmond, Indiana.

Dear Friend—Near midnight of the 27th of February a severe earthquake shock was felt in Oriente Province, Cuba. This was followed by other shocks of lesser intensity. Friends' mission property at Gibara and Puerto Padre was slightly damaged. No lives were lost in the district.

Sincerely, SYLVESTER JONES.

BIBLE SCHOOL LESSON

March 29.

Subject. (Review) — Jesus the Great Teacher.

Lesson.—Read Matt. 7: 21-29.

Golden Text.—What doth Jehovah require of thee, but to do justly, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with thy God.—Micah 6: 8.

Most of the quarter's lessons have recorded events and teachings in Perea.

Jesus is working His way toward Jerusalem. His earthly ministry will be ended within a few short months. The time is short and He must needs leave some great and fundamental truths with His disciples and with the multitudes.

The new kingdom was being formed—gradually in the hearts of the people—while they for the most part were looking for a temporal government.

1. Jesus and the Children. Teachableness, faith, obedience were the essentials of discipleship.

2. The Mission of the Seventy. Here is a lesson in evangelistic procedure. Seventy men in addition to the chosen disciples became the heralds of the new gospel.

3. The Good Samaritan. All men are thy brothers, and thy neighbor is he whom thou canst serve in helpfulness.

4. Serving Jesus. A lesson in obedient discipleship. We are workers together with God.

5. The Unfriendly Neighbor. A lesson on prayer and communion with the Father. Persistence in seeking God reveals the sincerity of the desire.

6. Darkness and Light. A lesson on the nature of Christ's kingdom. Jesus is the light of the world.

7. Christ's hatred of Shams. God looks at the heart. Phariseism was the embodiment of deceit and insincerity.

8. Faith destroying Fear. The world has no power against the consecrated life.

9. Trusting in Riches and Trusting in God. Life is more than possessions. Covetousness is not a Christian virtue. Greed is the forerunner of destruction.

10. Watchfulness. A Temperance Lesson. Man must be on guard over himself, his desires, his appetites, ready to resist the thief that would rob him of his dearest possessions. Man must guard his mind, must guard the home, society and state against the liquor traffic.

11. Lawful Use of the Sabbath. The Sabbath was made for man's benefit.

12. Lessons by the Way. Another lesson on the essential nature of the new kingdom, showing its gradual growth in human hearts, until it should fill the whole earth. Jesus warns those who do not possess His spirit and His life.

CORRESPONDENCE

On page 158 of THE AMERICAN FRIEND I find this, "Since we no longer believe the Bible is infallible." I want to know who constitute the "we" referred to. It would seem as though it was a Church or company of some sort or other, who have changed their minds in regard to the Bible. There are several questions that I am surprised and sorry to see in THE AMERICAN FRIEND. It certainly gives young people grounds to call in question the authority of the Holy Book. If the "we" is intended to mean the Friends Church, I don't want to be included.

I have never changed my opinion of the blessed Book except an increase of deep respect and reverence and confidence in its authority, and I know a large number of others are of the same mind. There is another question. To what extent may the Bible be looked upon as authority in matters of faith? There is no other authority. It was inspired by the Holy Spirit. The Bible being sanctioned by the Spirit, there can be no other authority. Is it true that the Friends as a people are changed? I do not think so and am sorry it should be so intimated. I know there are those among us who are not sound in the faith, but is it fair to judge the Church by those? The devil has been trying to destroy the Bible ever since it was written, but he will never succeed.

As regards the proposed conference of men, I have failed to see any subject proposed for consideration that might not be discussed by writing and save the expenditure of thousands of dollars it would take for the expenses of such a conference. There are millions of hungry souls who have never had a taste of the bread of life or of the water of life. I sincerely doubt the propriety of spending the means it would take to bear the expenses to that conference, in that way. I believe we who have the Bible are going to be held accountable for our neglect of the heathen. Of course we do not all see alike, but we can all pray one for another.

Sincerely, S. B. WOODARD.
Fountain City, Indiana.

Editor American Friend:

Dear Friend—In your issue of March 5th in the "Comprehensive Study Outline of the Young People's Union of Baltimore Yearly Meeting," on page 158 occurs this topic: "Since we no longer believe the Bible to be infallible, how are we to regard it?"

We certainly must have some unerring, infallible guide to direct us on our pathway from earth to Heaven. Inasmuch as the individual or committee arranging this program informs us we do not have it in the Bible, will they kindly inform us where we can find something more sure? Why accept part of the Bible and reject another part?

Very sincerely,
SAMUEL H. WILMORE.

NOT A MIRACLE

Just Plain Cause and Effect

There are some quite remarkable things happening every day, which seem almost miraculous.

Some persons would not believe that a man could suffer from coffee drinking so severely as to cause spells of unconsciousness. And to find relief in changing from coffee to Postum is well worth recording.

"I used to be a great coffee drinker, so much so that it was killing me by inches. My heart became so weak I would fall and lie unconscious for an hour at a time.

"My friends, and even the doctor told me it was drinking coffee that caused the trouble. I would not believe it, and still drank coffee until I could not leave my room.

"Then my doctor, who drinks Postum himself, persuaded me to stop coffee and try Postum. After much hesitation I concluded to try it. That was eight months ago. Since then I have had but few of those spells, none for more than four months.

"I feel better, sleep better and am better every way. I now drink nothing but Postum and touch no coffee, and as I am seventy years of age all my friends think the improvement quite remarkable."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Write for a copy of the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville."

Postum now comes in two forms:
Regular Postum—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

Come While He Calls To-day

By G. W. D.

List, sinner, list, and hear the Savior pleading—
Christ stands without—O, will you bid Him wait?
He comes to save you from your sins and sorrows—
Come, sinner, come, before it is too late!
List, sinner, list, the time is surely flying—
Give Him your heart just as it is today—
He will forgive your sins, though they be scarlet,
He then will bless and help you on your way.

List, Christian, list, and are you truly striving
To live the Christ—in act, in thought, in heart?
What have you done, in Christ's name, for your neighbor?
What have you given? How have you lived your part?
List, Christian, list, the sands of life are running—
Save thou one soul before the night shall end;
Take by the hand thy nearest, or thy dearest,
Saying, "The Lord will surely save thee, friend."

Come, Christian, come, and bring the unsaved with you—
Pray, Christian, pray, and God will hear your prayer;
Plead, Christian, plead, the Savior waits to bless you—
Work, Christian, work, the judgment day beware.
Sing, Christian, sing; redeemed, join the praises,
Sing and rejoice! to Jesus give your soul.
Hark, sinner-saved, repeat the blessed promise—
Christ forgives all! His blood hath made me whole!

List, mothers, list, bring every child to Jesus—
Forbid them not. Father, to you He calls—
"Come, thou and all thy house, unto Mine altar!"
See thou thy loved ones safe and saved within God's walls.
List, Churches, list, there's work within thy vineyards—
Save thou thy sinners; bid thy faithful pray—
Then will the world have heard the news of Jesus—
Mighty to save! Redeem! And light the way.

"Pray for One Another."—James 5: 16

CONTRIBUTED

I can not tell why there should come to me
A thought of some one miles and miles away,
In swift insistence on the memory,
Unless a need there be that I should pray.

Too hurried off' are we to spare the thought,
For days together of some friend away—
Perhaps God does it for us and we ought
To read His signal as a call to pray.

Perhaps just then, my friend has fiercer fight
And more appalling weakness and decay
Of courage, darkness, some lost sense of right,
And so, in case he needs my prayer,—I pray.

Friend, do the same for me if I intrude
Unasked upon you on some crowded day.
Give me a moment's prayer, and interlude,—
Be very sure I need it—therefore, pray.

And when you pray, dear Friend, I ask of thee
That thou will seek of God not mine own way,
Not what I want, but His blest thought for me.
Do thou through Jesus Christ implore, I pray.

A New Advertisement

We invite the attention of our readers to the new advertisement on the last page of THE AMERICAN FRIEND. The president of the new State Savings and Trust Company at Indianapolis is Mord Carter, who is a Friend, known prominently in Western Yearly Meeting.

He has been in the banking business for many years at Danville, Indiana, and in Indianapolis. When this new Trust Company wanted a president, after holding the place open for several weeks to get the best man possible, Mr. Carter was chosen for the position.

He represented Hendricks County in the State Legislature for two terms, and for a time was a trustee of Friends' Central Academy at Plainfield. This advertisement will have added interest to all Friends because of the standing of its president.

A Temperance Crusader of 1880

A dispatch yesterday told of the death of Miss Amanda J. Way at Whittier, California. Her name was as familiar in Kansas thirty years ago in connection with prohibition as that of John P. St. John. She was one of the leaders in the campaign that gave Kansas the Prohibitory Law.

Miss Way lived at Pleasanton, in Linn County, and came to Kansas from Maine. Kansas still was a young state and the spirit of the crusaders of territorial days, when the first settlers fought to make it free, inspired the movement to make the state dry.

Miss Way was a minister of the Quaker Church, and even in that day her hair was white and the fact that she had the strength to make such a vigorous campaign seemed remarkable. She made two and three speeches a day for prohibition, and her addresses were regarded as the most effective made in that stirring campaign.

Kansas witnessed a campaign that year, 1880, which has been equaled but once since in point of general public interest. The other campaign was that made by the Populists in 1890.

The Prohibitionists turned the pulpits into campaign platforms and Sunday-schools into rallying places for voters against the saloon. Prayer meetings were given over to prayers for the success of the cause, and from June until October basket meetings, picnics and camp meetings in groves and woods were conducted by the different communities in the state.

The prohibition campaign was more like a great religious revival than a political campaign. Songs, temperance songs, sung to familiar church tunes, were used in church choirs in place of the old time religious hymns.

And wherever Amanda Way went preaching temperance in those days great crowds attended her meetings. She was to the prohibition cause what Susan B. Anthony was to suffrage or Mary Ellen Lease was to Populism in later years, although she was as unlike either of them in her manner of campaigning as one could imagine. Instead of Miss Anthony's militant method or Mrs. Lease's vigorous manner, Miss Way carried with her always the gentle, quiet manner of the early Quakers, and instead of argument she appealed to the moral sentiment of the voters against the evils of what was termed in that day "the demon Rum."

Thousands of Kansans will recall her great work for that state and note the news of her death with sincere regret.—Kansas City Times, February 27.

"He who has placed all his hope in God may rest assured that, if the entire universe should rise up against him, nothing will befall him that is not ordained by God."

One thousand congregations in the Presbyterian Church have made the "every-member canvass" for weekly offerings to missions. The increase for benevolences on the average for the year is $1.12.

Training for the Religious Life

The home is the fundamental institution of society. An English mother wrote into her creed a determined purpose to train her children to be faithful children of God and disciples of Jesus Christ. That is the bed-rock principle of all human development. The immeasurable possibilities of every boy and girl constitute the most vital problems to which humanity may apply itself.

Yet all too often the children are left to their own inclinations, with only an occasional reprimand or admonition. Training means more than giving advice, more than setting up standards of conduct, more than reading moral homilies about the good and the bad, more than ruling by the iron rod of command. Training is keeping the object of attention in the right way, by leading, by example, by stirring the ambitions and aspirations, a word of praise here, a gentle rebuke there, a determined stand yonder, all applied to the cultivation of mind and soul and character until the youth is established in right principles and in correct living.

How often more attention is given to the care of the garden and the culture of the field than to the training of the child. Topsy "just grewed," and it is little wonder that in many lives the weeds grow more abundantly than do the fruits and the flowers. Every child is worth all the painstaking care that it takes to bring it to manhood or womanhood, unsullied in character and untainted in spirit. Most men who are failures in life had their destiny marked before they reached the "teen" age, all perhaps because parent or guardian did not understand the philosophy of childhood, did not understand that training meant culture in child life no less truly than in plant and vegetable life.

It is not enough to set up standards of conduct. It is not enough that men and women be converted. It is not enough that children be told the principles of right living. The vital element of teaching is training, and without it teaching is a sham.

The home, the church, the school and the Bible School furnish a fourfold unity of influences that should be applied constructively to the training of our youth. By harmony of effort they may touch and influence every phase of growing character, developing the mental, the physical and the spiritual in harmonious proportions, and thus produce well rounded, well balanced men and women ready for the world's work and trained for efficient service.

Efficiency is the watchword of this age, no less in the religious world than in the physical. But there can be no efficiency without rigorous training. It is a problem to which the church needs to apply itself. Training in Friends' homes has for the most part been excellent. But training by the church itself has never reached the dignity of a system. Not even does the Bible School utilize its opportunities, except in a somewhat haphazard way, to train the youth for the responsibilities of the church.

The future church, even the religious life itself will depend upon the religious training of the present. At a time when there is an awakening among our young people, the church itself cannot afford to delay the study of the problems of its children, who need to be trained, not only in the home and in the school, but in the church itself, in those principles that develop the spiritual life and fit our youth for the responsibilities of the religious world.

Temperance in Richmond

For the past few weeks, Richmond, Indiana, has been stirred by a campaign to vote the city "dry." Perhaps never in its history has interest in a great moral problem reached a higher pitch. Business and society life have been well nigh suspended while the people have turned aside to consider the saloon question.

The election was held on March 24, and before this issue reaches our readers the result will be known. A majority of 1869 five years ago for the saloon is a hard one to overcome, but the temperance people have waged a hopeful campaign.

The editor was prevailed upon to take the chairmanship of the committee for the "drys." If THE AMERICAN FRIEND has not been up to the usual standard in recent weeks, attribute it to this fact. We believe, however, that the entire church is interested in the effort to make our church headquarters "dry."

The Element of Silence in Worship

BY ORA CARROL *

I have been asked to write on the Element of Silence in Worship. In treating this theme I do not forget that there are other vital elements in worship. Neither do I conceive of worship as an end in itself. For worship means but little unless translated into actual touch with humanity. But I am limited by the natural bounds of my subject and can speak only of silence as one of the elements which may enter into worship. It has seemed to me that whatever I might say upon this theme would come with the greatest helpfulness and force if brought from the standpoint which connects with my own experience.

The Society of Friends has always been thought of as quite distinct in its form of worship. Our silent meetings have always stood in marked contrast to the highly ritualistic forms of Church worship. This element of silence in worship we have always held to be both valuable and precious. But just here we have often been misunderstood. Many have thought that we made silence in itself the center of worship. That was not the ideal when the meetings consisted largely of silence. We are far from doing that today when our own form of worship has been modified greatly in many cases. Silence is rather the center of worship as "our means of grace," for this is the only medium that we can conceive of as free enough to allow the unhindered working of the Holy Spirit in whose presence we gather and whose leadership we seek to follow in the course of the meeting. But silence is not the center as an end in itself.

Briefly stated, the basis of our meetings is this. We believe that worship is the highest act of life and can be truly performed only in response to the influence of the Spirit of God. Public worship is in accordance with the declaration of our Lord, that "where two or three are met together in My name, there am I in the midst of them."

The meeting is then, primarily, with Him. We believe that "worship consists neither in forms nor in the formal disuse of forms; it may be without words as well as with them. Both silence and vocal exercises are recognized and valued as means toward the attainment of an end, which is the divine blessing upon the individual and the congregation." As a denomination, we feel that one of the contributions which we have to make to the Christian Church is that of the democracy of all believers and individual responsibility in Church worship and life. To this end we believe that "God calls and qualifies whom He will to be the bearer of His message, and that the individual believer should hold himself in obedient submission to His will.

But to be more definite, what is a Friends' silent meeting like? We meet in the name and confidence of Him who promised to be with those who gather in His name. We come together without pre-arrangement so far as the meeting is concerned—not knowing who will speak, nor indeed, whether any shall speak. We enter into the meeting trusting the Spirit of God to lead just as He may choose. We sit down together in silence. There is no opening hymn, no call to worship, save by the Divine Leader Himself. The meeting is essentially a community of believers and a communion of worship.

At the beginning of the meeting each one comes as an individual in prayer and communion to render his praise, to present his need, and to seek the will of his Lord for the hour of worship. But there follows what is more significant—the fusing of the group into worship. Now we pray each for the other, and for the great wide interests of the Kingdom of God. If vocal prayer is offered, it is most significant that such prayer is felt to be, not the petition of a single worshipper for himself, but rather one which voices out the united desires of the group.

While we thus meet in silence, it is only with the thought that this shall be the means or medium of worship. Communion with God through Jesus Christ is the end of all our worship. To this end there is no pre-arranged silence; that is, a coming together with the thought that there shall be nothing but silence. That would defeat the end of our worship. It would prevent God from speaking through a human messenger as He so often wills to do. So in our conception of silent worship, silence and vocal expression are not incompatible. Very often there is much of vocal worship and expression in the meeting. A message may be brought just as any true message or sermon is given. Our Quaker silence is essentially a surrender,—a complete consecration of will and heart, of intellect and physical powers to the will of the Divine Leader. As one of our own writers has said: "The essential thing is that the group be one of surrendered selves, ready to be used just as and when the Spirit wills."

The entering into a meeting like this is a most searching experience. The silent meeting is a supreme venture of faith and obedience. The citadel of the life,—the mind and heart and will must not be held by any other conqueror if the Lord Christ and His Spirit are to hold sway. The true Quaker silence is not passive then; it is very active. It is the direct opposite of any sort of soul Nirvana. As one Quaker writer expresses it, "It should be peace-full, but it is often strenuous peace. Real, active listening is needed to know, to be sure when our call comes, what our message is, and to learn to deliver it faithfully."

What then is true worship in silence like? It is essentially a communion,—that of the human spirit with the Divine. It is that form of communion and prayer that waits for the answer. It is coming to God direct. It is in reality a "first-hand experience" of the soul with God. It is seeking, finding, and fellow-shiping with God. True silence also results in the closest possible fellowship with our fellowmen. While all are waiting in prayer together, the bonds of sympathy and love are strengthened in a most wonderful manner. Because there is a continual emphasis on personal responsibility, the result is effective personal service for Christ and our fellowmen.

But I would not wish to convey the impression that all Friends' meetings are conducted after the manner just described. This is true in principle but not always so in practice. We always insist on the leadership of the Divine Spirit. We always insist on simplicity and spirituality of worship. Times of worship are always times of communion. Opportunity is given for individual expression. But, speaking broadly, we feel that the circumstances of the times and the varied needs and conditions of our communities and cities demand human leadership as well,—leadership that shall be trained and fitted to serve the Church and the community in the most effective way possible. As a result, we have a pastoral system made up of those whose gifts in the ministry have been recognized by the Church. The majority of our meetings are conducted along lines similar to those of other denominations. But always there is the emphasis upon simplicity of worship and direct communion with God. During the meeting, in the early part of the service or near its close, or both, there are times of silent waiting before God when the worshippers seek to know His will and to commune with Him. The silence does not always come at the same time in the meeting. That would defeat the purpose of the silence and make it a purely formal thing. If the silence is to mean anything, it must come when the situation itself demands it. It must grow naturally out of the service,—when the quiet hush of God's Spirit seems to fall upon His people. It may come after the reading of Scripture. It may come before or after vocal prayer is offered. It may come just before the message is brought by the pastor, or it may come just at the close of the meeting. The secret of its value lies in the fact that it does not come at predetermined times, but that it grows out of the service and comes in response to the leading of the Holy Spirit.

Our own Church has not been alone in realizing the value of silence in worship. In fact, other denominations are coming to see its value and to introduce it into their meetings. One of the largest Episcopal Churches of Boston has organized a meeting in their Church which is conducted along the very lines of the Society of Friends. A member of the Society of Friends has been asked to meet with them and help them to worship after this manner. The leading Episcopal Church of Fall River, Massachusetts, observes times of silence in some of its Church services. There are those now going out from this Seminary who are using periods of silence in their public worship.

I can cite no better illustration of what I mean by the value of silence in worship than that furnished by the meetings of the great Student Volunteer Convention recently held in Kansas City. Those who were there realized as no one else could the deep significance of those moments of silent waiting when five thousand men and women were in prayer together. It was in those moments that the powerful messages of the convention hour seemed sealed upon the heart and life; when deep consecrations were silently made for service, and when the presence of the Lord Jesus Christ seemed very near. What those times of silence meant in that Convention, they may also mean to any group of worshippers. The message of a sermon may oftentimes be sealed upon the hearts of the people when followed by a silent waiting together in prayer. Thus the opportunity may be given to each worshipper to think of the message of the sermon for himself, and for him to hear God's message.

In closing, I would like to sum up the value of silence in worship as it has been experienced by different congregations of people. Times of silence give every individual the opportunity for personal participation in worship. They also tend to place the responsibility of the meeting on every individual. They result in community of prayer and community of worship. They give God an opportunity to speak. Early in the meeting, a true time of silence generates power for all that is to follow because the worshippers come into contact with the Divine power. Late in the meeting, a time of silence affords the opportunity to fix what has been said and to make personal consecration to whatever call God has given for service, as was true, for example, in the case of the Student Volunteer Convention.

Thus, a period of silence when it grows naturally out of the meeting, forms the very climax of the worship, for it is then that the soul meets God, catches a new vision of Jesus Christ, and so is prepared for a more effective service.

A Crooked Piece of Wood

BY ORSON L. MILES

A crooked piece of wood. What made it so? There are so many ways in which it might have happened. It might have been the bite of some tiny insect that caused the derangement of the cellular tissues of a young plant which caused it to grow crooked. It might have been trampled upon by some thoughtless child; it might have been crushed to earth by the foot of some wild beast, or perchance it was caused by the stress of storm, when lightning flash followed flash in rapid succession, and the roll and roar of the thunder could scarcely be heard above the scream and howl of the wind as it rushed forward with terrific force, rending, tearing and crushing everything in its path; even scouring the eternal hills by its mighty impact.

Whatever the cause, it was discarded because of its knarled and crooked condition. There it lay in the rubbish heap apparently valueless, till one day a skilled woodworker took it and dressed it. Toiling over it with skillful hands, and an eye single to the beauty which by his training he saw hidden away under its rough, twisted and crooked exterior. And after he had with the utmost care he could bestow finished polishing it, it shone forth with richness and splendor unexcelled.

Now you and I have seen lives like that crooked piece of wood, all knarled and stunted and bent under their load of sin. Little do we seem to care what caused it, we immediately consign them to the rubbish heap as was done with the crooked piece of wood and wash our hands and say, "I'll have nothing to do with them." But what caused these lives to grow crooked? Was it the bite of a thoughtless word? Of a careless act? Or a neglected duty? Was it the sting of an insulting insinuation that sank deep into the very heart of a young life and caused it to grow all knotted and knarled and crooked? Or was it crushed by the beasts of jealousy and hate? Ah! How many lives are ruined by the storm which we call society? Where the flow of the wine keeps pace with the dance, where vice runs riot, where skill at cards is of more importance than moral character and Sabbath desecration is the rule instead of the exception. As the master woodworker took the crooked piece of wood and made it beautiful, so Jesus our Lord, can take the crooked life, if it will but come to Him in trusting faith, and purify, polish and burnish it till it shines forth a jewel brilliant in the diadem of Jehovah.

Social Service in Action

BY E. HOWARD BROWN

I have been greatly interested, and to be honest, I must say, also somewhat perplexed by much that is being said and written today. There seems to be a great concern among some of the teachers over the country about the "Pastoral" question, the "Rural Community," "Social Service" and the use of young Friends in our meetings. I have hesitated to say anything hoping that some of those most concerned would become so burdened that they would give up their places of honor and remuneration and come out into the field of service and show us fellows how to solve some of these problems.

As I have heard of no resignations, no prospective or contemplated visits, I have wondered how many of these concerned persons really know what is going on in the Church out west. The pastors in these fields are not blowing their own horns, but I am sure that more than one of them has failed to appreciate all that has been said about his or her failure to grasp the situation, understand conditions and to meet the needs of the community in which they labor.

I have wondered how long the college men or the editors of religious papers would enjoy a constant clamoring for better teachers, more able and better management of church organs and men of greater vision in the chairs of our colleges. Would such criticism be enjoyed if made by some of us who have never taught and who have been out of college for fifteen or twenty years? I think a doctor should at least see his patient before he decides upon the disease or remedy. Now let us come out and look one community in the face. Let us go to the parsonage and meet this weakling of a pastor; let us learn why he fails or if he fails, and if he is not a failure, at least see what he is doing. I am sure there is not a pastor in all the Church who is not willing to learn, and who is not willing to step down and out the moment the Church can secure those who better understand the needs of the community and can prove that they are better able to satisfy and supply their needs, even if he come as a secretary instead of a pastor.

Come to a western town with a population of 800. We shall have no trouble in finding the Friends' Church for it stands on a prominent corner in the center of town and can be seen from the depot. Not all our churches are, but the new ones are, being more carefully located.

We call on the pastor. We make inquiry about his flock. The average pastor will draw from his vest pocket or desk a small book and in a moment can tell you the number in his congregation. He knows who are resident members and who are non-resident. He has kept track of those who have gone still farther west. He also seems familiar with every man's standing in the community. We have found that this man has a membership of 300 in his congregation. There are a large number of non-resident members who have gone to Colorado or California. The Bible School attendance reaches 150, which is good considering that half of this membership live in the country, some as far as five miles distant. There are eleven teachers in the school, two of them are under twenty years of age, the secretary and pianist are under eighteen.

Up-to-date methods are used. Graded lessons, primary rooms, little red chairs, charts, etc. A teacher's training class with twenty members is taught each week by the pastor. A home department and cradle roll are both being pushed and are in touch with the homes both in and out of the Church. Organized classes are doing practical work. The Christian Endeavor Society numbers thirty-six, mostly under twenty and all under thirty. Ten committees are all actively engaged in carrying on an aggressive campaign for reaching the young people of the community and saving them. They are in touch with the state and national work.

A Junior Society meets on Wednesday afternoon at four o'clock. Here a young lady of less than twenty-five, with an assistant, teaches and leads about forty children in the way of life; nearly all of them have decided publicly for Christ. The Ladies' Aid has a membership of about forty and are pushing forward their work with "Work Meetings," Social Meetings and a Missionary Class. There are no meetings to raise money, but all their efforts are for the upbuilding of the Church in every way.

The young people sing but do not call themselves a choir. There is always a time for prayer in the meetings for worship. Often quite a number offer vocal prayer in the meetings. The prayer meeting is held on Wednesday evening. From twenty to forty attend this meeting and it is largely a time of prayer. Not all the members attend. There are many homes with small children and the distance affects the attendance also. Many young people attend and take part in the prayer meeting. The pastor usually brings a short message during the meeting.

Once each month the prayer meeting is followed by Monthly Meeting. One of the Clerks at present is a young lady of twenty. The attendance on the evening of Monthly Meeting will vary from fifty to one hundred. Business is dispatched quickly, sometimes in the regular fashion, but often by motion and voting. Through the different committees, the Church is interested in the town and community and doing her best to fill a place and does fill a great place in the community.

Now let me ask, when a Church is thus organized, when every department is well manned and doing its work and seeking to do it better all the time, when a pastor has kept in touch with all this net-work of constructive machinery, attends most of the committee and department meetings, preaches twice each Sabbath, leads the prayer meeting, visits the sick, looks after the strangers and newcomers, do you think it fair to call him a failure from afar?

Do you think a trained secretary, a college professor, a "Social Service" expert, who has just come from the school-room with head full of theories and untried plans, could take his place and improve upon his labors? Are those thus concerned actually engaged in carrying on some work of this kind on the side? Are they working their plans in some community? If they are, we western fellows will stop, look and listen. If we can follow someone who is doing more and better work, we are ready to step down and out of the way of those who can and will do the work.

The figures will vary, but the work is being carried forward by the hundreds of faithful, sacrificing, consecrated men and women pastors. The average western pastor is not far from the picture I have drawn. We do not feel that people are able to say what we are doing or what we are not doing; how much we understand of the needs of community, or fail to understand; whether we are a failure as pastors or are unsuccessful in solving the problems of the Church, unless those who judge us have at least passed through the great Mississippi Valley on one of our railway sleepers.

No specialist on Christian Endeavor work or Bible School work, who has become a specialist by book information only can come to the young people or Bible School teachers on the field and be of much service to them. No worker from America can tell the missionary on the field how and when to accomplish the most. Just so messages on "Social Service" from people who have been reading only, and criticism on the rural church problem from teachers who have spent their life in the school-room, come to the active pastor, under these multitudinous burdens as messages without a soul. We are always glad to listen to the man or woman who is "doing something."

Earlham, Iowa.

At the conference of foreign mission secretaries held last month in the city of New York, it was stated that the Protestant Churches of the United States and Canada gave last year for foreign missions $16,458.00.

A Monthly Meeting Chronicle

(Wherein is told the story of a Monthly Meeting which caught a vision, and with some misgivings decided to improve an opportunity.)

BY JUNIUS JUNIOR

XI.

"Where He leads me I will follow,
I'll go with Him all the way."

Thus sang the congregation in a hymn of consecration, led by the young school teacher. A dozen prayers followed with petitions for the baptism of the Spirit upon all the membership and that the spirit of service might characterize all their activities. The theme of the sermon was a closer walk with God, and the resident minister gave an exhortation in behalf of the dedicated life that thrilled the membership and caused deep searching of heart on the part of all.

There was a melting of hearts and at the suggestion of the pastor, the entire congregation bowed in a consecration service, wherein the Spirit fell upon them and a deep sense of the presence of God pervaded every soul. Arising from their knees they tarried yet a while as in the very presence of the Lord, as one after another expressed a need of Divine guidance and a desire to have the life conformed to the will of the Father. The spirit of revival was manifest, and the best guarantee of its sincerity was the soul consciousness of a hunger to know their Lord in all His fullness.

When at last the opening minute was read, and before the Clerk had had opportunity to take up the business of the meeting, our friend the farmer, who led the Committee on internal organism, voiced the conviction that the time had come for the meeting to express itself in a special evangelistic effort both for the quickening of the Church and the salvation of souls in the community. He said the meeting had developed an activity that was unusual, but unless the whole neighborhood felt the touch of the religious life, unless men and women outside the Church were brought face to face with Jesus Christ, their efforts would not be abiding.

While two or three argued that the example of the meeting and of the members was already a potent force for righteousness in the community, and that whole families were being touched by an earnest desire to know God, the bulk of the members joined with the farmer in recognizing that there were scores of families in Newtown and the surrounding country which could never be gotten inside the doors of a church building except through the invitation of some special evangelistic effort. The question was referred to the pastor and the Evangelistic Committee with the suggestion that a series of meetings begin on Thanksgiving night.

It was reported that the Bible School Committee had opened a Sabbath School at the Bennett school-house two weeks ago with a charter enrollment of twenty-four, which a week later had grown to twenty-nine. The outlook was most encouraging, and the people of that neighborhood were loud in their expressions of appreciation of the work undertaken by the young people of Slow Valley Meeting.

The Christian Endeavor Society was growing, and the new Bible School at the Bennett school-house was an object of special concern to the Society. At the last meeting the subject of foreign missions was under consideration, and it was voted to send $3.00 monthly to the work in Africa, being conducted under the care of the Foreign Missionary Board of the Five Years Meeting.

The new applicants for membership were reported upon favorably and were welcomed into the Church, while applications for two others were read and referred to the proper committee. One of these was a newcomer in Newtown, while the other was a man who had been raised a Friend, but had grown careless and had been dropped from the meeting rolls some fifteen years ago.

It was reported that the mission in the foreign quarter had been reorganized, but that owing to the incongruous character of the foreign element, the work was dragging somewhat. Conditions in many of these homes were deplorable, and little of the religious life was manifested. It was becoming apparent that a city missionary would have to be employed if the right person could be found, but no action had yet been taken, partly because no suitable person had been found, and partly because the funds for support were not yet available. The matter was passed by with little discussion, but not without a feeling that this was a problem, to the solution of which the religious forces of Newtown must apply themselves in the near future as they had not yet done.

"I think the time has come when every member of Slow Valley Meeting should be made to feel the financial responsibility of our Church activities." This was the closing remark of our friend the business man and merchant, who had made a strong appeal for the every-member canvass, and the envelope system of collecting contributions weekly throughout the year. For an hour the discussion had gone on, and it was evident that there was not entire unanimity on the proposition. Some were fearful that unless a definite budget was provided for by a direct assessment, the meeting would be in worse condition financially than it was at present. To this reply was made that conditions could not be much worse than they had been in recent years. It was reported by the treasurer that notwithstanding the recent revival of interest in the meeting, there was still a deficiency in two or three of the accounts, while the pastor's salary was still in arrears.

It was shown that during the past three months there had been an increase in contributions to foreign missions, which fact was seized upon by those who were friendly to the every-member canvass plan as indicating what would be the result on the entire income of the meeting if the old assessment plan were abandoned entirely.

Three of the members who had attended one of the United Mission Conferences in a nearby city were enthusiastically in favor of the plan of voluntary offerings, and outlined in detail the plan for a universal canvass during the coming March. They said that where the voluntary method of giving had been followed, after a thorough canvass of the members had been made, the income had increased from forty to one hundred per cent.

The meeting finally decided to make a temporary canvass of the membership on the first Sabbath in December and directed the Finance Committee to secure envelopes to be used for the first time the first week in January. It was decided also that a more effective campaign should be made in March, and that meanwhile a special meeting should be called of the congregation to consider the details of the United Mission Campaign as applied to individual churches. While it had taken four or five months to break through the shell of conservatism, the progressive element of the meeting felt a sense of relief that an experiment was to be tried in which they had the fullest confidence, and which, when once applied to their activities, would solve the meeting's financial problems.

It was reported that the new roof was on the meeting house and that the addition for the Primary department would be completed within ten more days if the weather remained good. It was announced that $113.00 additional had been subscribed to the building fund.

The Clerk reported that he had received replies from four more of the non-resident members, in which all expressed their appreciation of the message from the meeting and stated their desire to remain with Friends. After a prayer by the pastor, the concluding minute was read, and the congregation dispersed, conscious of the presence of the Spirit, and ready for any service to which they might be called.

Faith Tested

A jeweler gives as one of the surest tests for diamonds, the "water test." He says: "An imitation diamond is never so brilliant as a genuine stone. If your eye is not experienced enough to detect the difference, a simple test is to place the stone under water. The imitation diamond is practically extinguished, while a genuine diamond sparkles even under water, and is distinctly visible. If you place a genuine stone beside an imitation under water, the contrast will be apparent to the least experienced eye."

Many seem confident of their faith so long as they have no trials; but when the waters of sorrow overflow them, their faith loses all its brilliancy. It is then that true servants of God, like Job, shine forth as genuine jewels of the King.—Homiletic Review.

A Prescription

To make a Sabbath-school attract the people in the community, have a "hand-shaking committee." Put the spiritual before the mechanical; make an atmosphere of genuine sympathy; have real teaching of the Word; give every member something definite to do; train the Christians in service and stress soul-winning.—Baptist Standard.

III. SEVEN FEATURES OF A GOOD FINANCIAL PLAN

1. The details of its practical operation must be carefully worked out. John R. Mott has given it as his judgment that the reason why so many churches accomplish so little for the world's evangelization is because they have no adequate plan in their church business. Whatever the plan, it must be diligently prosecuted. No plan for raising money will work itself. It must be made to work by intelligent, sustained effort on the part of members who have been wisely chosen and set apart for that particular line of church labor. The silver and gold belong to God, as Haggai teaches, but He calls for steady, systematic effort by His people to turn it into channels of His service.

2. Its motto should be, "Every church member a contributor, and a cheerful contributor." When Paul called for a collection in the church at Corinth his appeal was simple and direct: "Let every one of you give." The initial step toward providing adequate funds for the Church should not be in the direction of securing increased gifts from those members upon whom a large share of the financial burden already rests, no matter what their ability as compared with that of other members. The first purpose should be to rally all the membership to Paul's standard of giving, namely, "each one as God hath prospered him." There is such a thing as creating an atmosphere of cheerful liberality throughout a congregation. As one important means to this end, the fullest possible publicity should be given in regard to all church expenditures. So far as possible, every person who is called upon to contribute should be informed as to where every dollar that is collected goes. When the spirit of giving is aroused in all the members its stimulating influence goes far toward securing increased gifts from the customary contributors.

3. It must conform to sound business principles. No system is a satisfactory one that does not proceed upon "the theory that a man or body of men can plan more effective and constructive work if they know in advance what they have to work with." The bearing of this upon appropriations for the support of pastors, missionaries, boards and standing committees is too obvious to need comment.

4. Its scope must be comprehensive enough to include the local expenses of the congregation and the work of all the denominational boards and standing committees. The necessity for a more equitable support for all of our departments of work now needs to be squarely faced and earnestly acted upon. By way of illustration, take a single example. No one could wish that the growing enthusiasm of Friends for our foreign missions should suffer the least abatement. On the contrary, every reasonable effort to maintain and to augment it is to be most heartily encouraged. But the time has fully come when strong emphasis must be laid upon the fact that other departments of vital importance to the cause of Christ in the world have been organized and put into operation by our denomination since the time when the claims of the heathen world obtained so strong a hold upon us. With every passing year, and especially since the last Five Years Meeting, the pressing claims of these newer departments are emerging into stronger light. The home base, which in the United Campaign was placed upon an equality of importance with the foreign field, is given lamentably small place in the financial offerings throughout all of our Yearly Meetings. Our departments of Evangelism, Bible Schools, Young People's Activities, Social Service, Education and Temperance, all stand today in most urgent need of larger respective shares of the money raised by the Church. The claims of these departments cannot longer be ignored without serious loss to the position and influence of the Friends Church in the world. They must be given generous recognition in any financial plan that can justly be regarded as adequate at this stage of our denominational development.

5. It must constitute a constant education of the church membership in the obligations of Christian stewardship. In this, whether it be promoted by the ministry, the Bible School instruction, the work of missionary societies or the special, occasional appeals of treasurers and finance committees, divine wisdom and anointing are as essential as they are in the preaching of a Gospel sermon or the exercise of any other spiritual gift.

6. The raising and administration of funds must be entrusted to members whose personal integrity, benevolent spirit and business qualification recommend them to the confidence of all who are expected to give. They must combine business sense with religious earnestness. The rule in the Apostolic Church was that those appointed to this service must be "men of good report, full of the Spirit of wisdom."

7. Its ultimate reliance for success must be upon personal work among the members of the congregation. The personal touch is as necessary and effective in raising money for the cause of Christ as it is in the larger work of saving souls. No other means, as a rule, can be used so successfully in influencing the member who is indifferent to his financial obligations to the Church, as a private appeal from a discrete personal solicitor (or better, two together), in which the claims of the work of the Church are, in a friendly spirit, tactfully and pointedly pressed upon him.

JOSEPH JOHN MILLS,

A writer in The Congregationalist puts the truth very forcibly when he says that "belief in a miracle may not seem essential to salvation, but it may be exceedingly essential to the trustworthiness of the Gospels."

Current Items of Interest to Friends

CALIFORNIA YEARLY MEETING

Pasadena.—Pasadena Friends are planning to conduct late in March an every-member canvass for pledges to the annual budget of the church, an amount which includes the local expenses and the "benevolences." A committee of fifty members is preparing for the campaign.

O. B. and Mary S. T. Ong and family have transferred their membership from Mt. Pleasant, Ohio, to Pasadena, California.

On March 8th Sylvester Newlin preached a stirring prohibition sermon at Pasadena, arousing Friends to action in behalf of the prohibitory amendment which is to be submitted to the voters of California next November.

Dr. Calvin W. Pearson, formerly of Earlham and Beloit Colleges, now located near Philadelphia, is sojourning in Pasadena, and visiting nearby points in southern California.

San Jose.—Berkeley Quarterly Meeting was held in San Jose, March 6th to 8th inclusive. Delegates were present from Berkeley, Oakland and Denair. John T. Hadley, Yearly Meeting Superintendent, attended all the sessions of the Quarterly Meeting, and remained for a few days' meetings in San Jose. Robert M. Douglas was in attendance Saturday and Sunday and preached the Quarterly Meeting sermon on Sunday. Other messages were given by John Hadley, Levi Gregory and Olive Guyer. All were helpful and inspiring. The Sabbath School at San Jose is gaining in both interest and attendance. Friends locating in California will find an open door for helping on the Lord's work here in San Jose, a very needy field. Do not locate where you are not needed, but where you can lift and find service for Christ.

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING

Wabash.—We feel that never before in the history of the South Wabash Friends' Church was there a brighter outlook for the future work of the Church. It is alive and at work. Its various departments are organized and have been accomplishing things really worth while, but have visions of greater things for the future. The interest of the people is shown by an increase of attendance at Sunday-school and church. A. J. Furstenberger and wife came to us last October and the Church has been growing under their efficient leadership. Mr. Furstenberger is a man surcharged with energy and he manifests this not only in the pulpit but also in his untiring zeal outside. He is much interested in all movements that make for reform and the betterment of society and does not hesitate to preach his convictions straight from the shoulder. He has an able assistant in his wife, whose efficient work in the Sunday-school, Christian Endeavor with the music and other departments of the church work has been greatly appreciated.

We have recently been having a number of special services which have served to arouse much interest and enthusiasm on the part of the members. The week of prayer was observed from January 18th to 25th. Although the weather was inclement on Church Going Day, the pastor addressed an audience of more than two hundred people on the subject, "The Book of Books," which was a most fitting theme for the occasion.

One of the greatest blessings that has come to the Church in the last few weeks is the lifting of the church debt which has been hanging over us for the past several years. The trustees of the Church determined some time ago to lift this indebtedness by March 1st if possible, and by their prayers and earnest efforts together with the able assistance of the pastor, they raised $2,609.83 within ten days, the Sunday-school giving more than $250.00 of this amount. There was great rejoicing when it was learned that more than enough money had been raised to cover all indebtedness. The trustees have been men who have had the welfare of the Church at heart and have remained faithful to the end. We feel now that we can enlarge our borders and move forward more rapidly to great victories since we no longer have the burden of debt. Our hearts overflow with gratitude to our Heavenly Father who has so wonderfully blessed us. According to previous plans Sunday, March 1st, was set apart as a time to herald the good news and a special program was given which was in keeping with the occasion.

On March 6, 7 and 8 were held the various sessions of the Quarterly Meeting which proved to be one of the most successful meetings held here in many years. There were many in attendance from other meetings. On Friday evening Ancil Ratliff, Efficiency Secretary of Foreign Missions, gave an inspiring address on the subject of missions. He made an earnest appeal to the Church in behalf of this work. He explained clearly the duplex system and recommended its use. We expect to take up this system in our meeting. Ancil Ratliff's energy, his keen insight, his great interest in this work makes him an Efficiency Secretary worthy of the name.

There was an excellent attendance at Quarterly Meeting on Saturday morning and the people listened to a very impressive sermon preached by Richard Haworth, our beloved pastor of former years. Following the business session on Saturday, the people repaired to the dining room of the Church where dinner was served to all. After this many remained to enjoy a delightful social hour together. The Christian Endeavor Society had charge of the services on Saturday evening. Dalton Lewis, of New Castle, addressed the people on the subject of Discipleship. It was an excellent address and listened to with intense interest by those present. He spoke in a clear, forceful manner, with such fluency of expression and with such directness and sincerity that people were deeply impressed. An interesting and unique program had been arranged for Sunday morning, at which time the people witnessed the burning of the mortgage. It was a sight which rejoiced their hearts and they sang, "Praise God From Whom All Blessings Flow." Aaron Napier, of Amboy, preached a strong sermon, his subject being, "In the Way." He presented the truth in a most convincing manner. The Church was filled almost to its capacity on this occasion. About three hundred people gathered on Sunday evening to listen to that splendid address given by Mrs. Elizabeth Stanley, the State Vice-President of the W. C. T. U. She is a woman of extraordinary ability and is one of the earnest and efficient leaders in the great cause of temperance. The people showed themselves to be in hearty sympathy with the cause which she represents by their enthusiastic applause and by their quick response when she called them to vote as a body for nation-wide prohibition. The people of the Church are now looking forward to the coming of Lindley A. Wells, who is to conduct a series of meetings from April 16 to May 3. We are praying that these meetings will result in great blessings to the Church and community and that many souls will be brought to Christ.

Cashmere, Washington.—Friends of Cashmere, Washington, were greatly helped and encouraged on Tuesday evening, March 3d, by visit of the Evangelistic Committee of Puget Sound Quarterly Meeting. Robert Pretlow, chairman, and also pastor at Seattle, Washington, gave an interesting address. Lettie Gregory of Everett, Washington, and Abigail Thomas, of Tacoma, gave helpful talks.

Friends at Cashmere, Washington, held their first meeting on the 8th of March in their new meeting house. This work while not yet a year old has grown from nothing to fifty and upwards, and from a small, humble dwelling to a fair sized building. Money has been freely given by people living in the neighborhood and by the labor being donated it is free of debt. Lettie Gregory, of Everett, Washington, had the privilege of talking first in the new house. Abigail Thomas, of Tacoma, also Claude Barker, of Peshastin, gave helpful talks. The building will be dedicated in the near future as at present it is not entirely completed.

Traverse City, Michigan.—Rev. Austice Harvey, pastor of Traverse City (Michigan) Friends Meeting has recently been appointed to the position of President of the Ministerial Association of that place.

Mr. and Mrs. Orval Chance have moved from Traverse City, Michigan, to Jonesboro, Indiana, where he will take up pastoral work in two meetings near that place.

The C. E. Society of Traverse City Friends Meeting is studying Margaret Fox of Swarthmore Hall, by Helen G. Crosfield, at their study hour just previous to their C. E. meetings Sunday evenings. The 11th district C. E. Convention was held at that place the 6th, 7th and 8th inst., which proved a help and added inspiration to that already wide-awake C. E. Society.

IOWA YEARLY MEETING

Woolson.—Revival meetings began at Woolson, February 22, following immediately the Quarterly Meeting held at Pleasant Plain. The pastor, Alvin Hosins, had charge, assisted by Miss Elva Jackson, of Oskaloosa, as singer. Much interest was manifested from the first. The meetings continued three weeks and besides the Church being built up generally, forty-two persons claimed definite blessings, conversions, renewals and baptism of the Holy Ghost. Twenty have given their names to become members of Friends and perhaps more to follow. All praise to Him who giveth victory.

Earlham.—E. Howard Brown gave his popular address on "Friends History" here on Sabbath evening, March 8th. The address was illustrated with nearly one hundred stereopticon pictures of early ministers, places, Friends colleges and educators, also many churches and ministers of today of today. The pictures were good. We were made to feel proud that we belonged to a Church that, although small, had presented to the world so many great principles and forced them to be taken up.

The Earlham W. C. T. U. is composed largely of Friends. It has been carrying on a temperance educational campaign this winter, through the medium of a series of Demorest Contests. The last number was held in the Friends Church, Thursday evening. Regardless of inclement weather, the house was filled. They have all been of excellent quality.

KANSAS YEARLY MEETING

La Harpe.—Buffalo Quarterly Meeting was held at La Harpe, February 28. On Friday night a very interesting meeting on temperance was held in which C. F. Walker gave the principal address. On Saturday the regular session with good attendance and much feeling was held. There seemed to be a general awakening as to the real need of the church and more spirit of unity and fellowship was expressed by all. On Saturday night a live missionary meeting was held in which a number took part. On Sunday C. F. Walker gave the message with much interest. We are glad to note these different lines of work were well represented and expect to be maintained in future. They have been woefully neglected in the past.

Rose Hill.—A series of meetings began here February 19 and closed March 10, conducted by Thomas Hodgkin. Thirty-five sessions were held; about thirty professed definite blessings received; some conversions, others renewal and sanctification. We believe the Lord was with us from the first and people got nearer God and nearer to each other, and we are glad our brother came this way. The truth was preached in a strong and forceful manner that went straight home to the hearts of the hearers. He received a liberal contribution and some of the comforts of life to carry home to his family. "Freely ye have received, freely give."

Elk River Quarter.—Elk River Quarterly Meeting was held at Bolton, February 20-22. Henry L. Jones, of Wild Cherry, Arkansas, was in attendance, having come to that place February 11th, and had been engaged in a revival from the 11th until the time of the Quarterly Meeting. The attendance was small on account of the inclement weather. On Saturday night after the temperance and foreign mission program, Brother Jones preached one of his forceful sermons. Two came to the altar and professed to be saved; two others, man and wife, had very bright conversions the day before. On Monday night, the 23d, H. L. Jones began at Independence, Kansas, and held two weeks, preaching the gospel as we understand it, in its simplicity and fullness and with the demonstration and power of the Holy Spirit, and while we did not see as much result as we had wished, only one making a public acknowledgment of salvation, we feel the meeting has been a wonderful uplift to the church and an eye-opener to many who thought the Friends Church did not amount to much on account of us not practicing the ordinances. He gave one sermon on Sabbath at three o'clock on our belief in regard to them. People from almost all the churches attended part of the meetings. Brother Jones left with a warm place in many hearts and we are arranging to have him come as a pastor for us, if he can so arrange to do so.

OREGON YEARLY MEETING

Lents.—Portland Quarterly Meeting held at Lents, a suburb of Portland, Oregon, March 6, 7 and 8, was a season of edification. The business was transacted in harmony. S. Alice Hanson, a minister, was granted a minute liberating her to any service in the will of the Master in case a way should open for her to accompany her husband, John F. Hanson, on his proposed visit to Norway and other parts of the old world. The presence and ministry of W. H. Perry, pastor of the Friends' Churches in Tacoma, Washington, added to the interest of the meetings for worship. The subjects of systematic giving and missions were each considered at different sessions. By reason of adopting the tithing system the problem of raising needed money for church work is less difficult. The plan seems to be gaining favor. At the missionary session an exercise illustrating the deplorable state of womanhood in heathen lands made a deep impression. The testimony and experience regarding their call to missionary service given by a number of young people was a most impressive feature of this session. Among the number was Carrie Wood, recently returned from the field in India.

On Sabbath afternoon a conference was held, the general subject being "Friends in the Northwest," a view of various phases of which gave an enlarged vision of our field and opportunity.

By invitation of West Piedmont Monthly Meeting the sessions of the Quarterly Meeting in sixth month will be held at that place.

The pastors of our various meetings being efficient evangelists the work in this line is well cared for, but not to the neglect of other departments. During recent months special revival efforts have been conducted in most of our meetings. At Lents, soon after taking charge as pastors, John and Nettie Riley engaged in special evangelistic meetings with good results. At Portland, the Mother Meeting of the quarter, Josephine Hockett and husband, late of Kokomo, assisted Homer and Blanche Cox in a three weeks' revival, which resulted in definite blessing to many. The presence and power of the Spirit was evident in unusual manifestations.

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING

Haverford.—Prof. Wilson's class of the S. S. entertained the members of Dr. Baker's class in the Haverford College gymnasium on the evening of March 14th.

Roy S. Wallace, Secretary of the Philadelphia Vice Commission, spoke interestingly before Dr. Baker's S. S. class recently on the work for the suppression of prostitution in Philadelphia.

A group of upper classmen has just finished a study of Mott's "Decisive Hour of Christian Missions" under the leadership of Yoshio Nitobe, '15. They are now taking up a study of Islam and its problem.

Augustus T. Murray, '85, Professor of Greek at Leland Stanford, spent the week of March 8-14 visiting his son and old friends at the college. He spoke before the students in class room, Y. M. C. A. and Meeting. On Tuesday evening he gave a thoughtful lecture on the "Spiritual Message of Whittier." In other more informal ways the students were privileged to meet Prof. Murray.

Rufus M. Jones was University preacher at Harvard for the first two weeks of February. During that time he had charge of the daily chapel exercises and oversight of the other religious activities of the University. At one of the Sunday services he spoke on "The Message of Quakerism." Dr. Jones also lectured on the same subject at St. Pauls, the Episcopal Cathedral in Boston, and at Wellesley College. In both of these places following the lecture, silent Quaker Meetings were held in which the attenders entered heartily. Rufus Jones was very well received in all the places as he presented the message of vital Quakerism.

WESTERN YEARLY MEETING

Carmel.—Carmel Quarterly Meeting Christian Endeavor Union was held at Noblesville March 8th, with a pretty good attendance, especially from Carmel. The meeting was addressed by Fred Emerson the General Superintendent. Carmel Quarterly Meeting was held the 13th, 14th and 15th of March. William J. Clever in his pleasing manner gave the Gospel messages on sixth and seventh days, creating in his hearers a greater thirst for right living and a proper preparation for the life that is to come. On Sabbath Helen F. Ford gave a missionary message making very plain our duty and responsibility in the missionary work of the Church.

Carmel Meeting observed AMERICAN FRIEND Day, but we seem to lack the power to persuade our members to be loyal to our church organ, and very few are taking it. We expect to have an every-member canvass for Missions in this month.

First Friends, Indianapolis.—Earlham Day was observed at First Friends' Church, Indianapolis, Indiana, by an exceedingly able sermon by the pastor, W. O. Trueblood, setting forth in a very forcible way, the necessity of our college boys and girls obtaining a moral and religious education along with the other branches of college work. He pointed out the fact that this phase is being emphasized by the leading educators now more than ever before, and has always been one of the strong points of Earlham College.

New London.—New London Quarterly Meeting was held the 6th, 7th and 8th of March. Arthur Hammond, of Carmel, attended services on sixth and seventh days, and gave helpful messages. Other ministers present on seventh-day were Frank V. Stafford, of Dana, Indiana, James A. Parr, of Ridgefarm, Illinois, and Charles Axton, of Kokomo. Vincent Nicholson, of Richmond, was also present. Each had some part in the services. There was a feeling of the greatest harmony and soul-fellowship throughout. Vincent Nicholson presented the Endowment needs of Earlham College and tried to impress each member that it is our schools, and it is of supreme interest to the church that it be maintained and kept up to the standard it now holds. Frank V. Stafford brought the message on Sabbath morning in his convincing way showing man's duty to God and his work. The W. F. M. S. held an interesting session on Sabbath afternoon. Our Quarterly Meeting Superintendent Mary C. Hadley, is serving her eighth year in that position.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE AMERICAN FRIEND is a valuable paper, and should be in every Friend's home, and especially the isolated members should take their Church paper to keep in touch with the work. If such persons or others knowing of such Friends would send their address to be published in THE AMERICAN FRIEND, the paper could be sent to them and perhaps get them interested in it. In the southwest of Texas, New Mexico and Arizona, there are isolated members, and so many Friends moving West that if they knew the address of others already there, they might go to the same place and many meetings would be established when otherwise the members are lost to our Church. And by uniting their forces instead of scattering, the Church would be built up all over this new country and great good would be done in and for the Church.

A VERY MUCH INTERESTED MEMBER.

BIBLE SCHOOL LESSON

April 5.

Subject.—Christ's Table Talk.

Lesson.—Luke 14: 7-24.

Golden Text.—Everyone that exalteth himself shall be humbled; and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted.

Time.—January A.D. 30.

Place.—In Perea.

The social side of the Christian life is one of its chief characteristics. It is the social touch that begets confidence. Hospitality is the friendly soil in which is developed friendship.

The quarter's lesson opens with a continuation of the events recorded in the last lesson. Jesus is at the table of the ruler of the Pharisees on the Sabbath day sitting with the guests at the table. He is being watched, but the social hour at a table is not conducive to deep suspicion.

Yet even at this congenial hour, Christ notices the selfishness of His guests, how they were crowding into the favored seats, and true to His custom He rebukes them and teaches a lesson of preferring one another.

He appeals to their love of place and position by pointing out the greater honor of being asked to a higher seat than the one they have voluntarily chosen. He that exalteth himself shall be humbled, but he that is humble shall be exalted.

It was a new doctrine to the Pharisees. Every man for himself was their rule of life. As some one has said, "To go down lower may mean to come up higher." "Blessed are the meek for they shall inherit the earth." It is the law of promotion in the Christian life.

Christ teaches a lesson of service. He was preaching against the doctrine of recompense, of showing favors for the sake of receiving favors. It was a greater thing to get a hold upon the needy and the outcast than it was to show favors to those of their own set. The needy, at least, would appreciate the service, which others are not always ready to do.

Herein was a lesson which revealed Christ's own purpose. His was a message to unsaved humanity. "Go out into the highways and hedges, and constrain them to come in." "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." These are parallel obligations. The whole world is bidden to the table of the Lord.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR

April 5.

Topic.—Twelve Great Verses. IV. The Power Verse.—Phil. 4: 13. (Consecration Meeting.)

The world is constantly striving for greater efficiency, for increased power, for the ability to perform its tasks. But men are not always willing to pay the price for power.

Too frequently they assume a waiting attitude, looking for some supernatural demonstration that will pick them up and set them upon the high road to success.

Power comes through consecration and through application. "And ye shall receive power when the Holy Ghost has come upon you," but the Holy Spirit cannot abide in any except a life that is dedicated and surrendered to the will of the Father.

Power is useless unless it be applied. The steam in the locomotive is wasted unless it have a track upon which to manifest its power. The energy of the dynamo is lost unless there be the wire to carry the current to the distant machinery.

Power in the religious life is lacking unless the Spirit of God have a chance to operate through a willing, surrendered life. This is the primary source of the Christian's power, a surrendered, consecrated life, in which the Spirit of God may abide and through which it may operate.

Assign texts embodying the idea of power, strength and efficiency to the members, and ask each of the older ones to amplify the meaning and application briefly.

THE SOCIALIZED CONSCIENCE

We have received at this office a copy of Professor J. Herschel Coffin's "The Socialized Conscience," which came from the press of Warwick & York, Incorporated, Baltimore, the first of the year. The book is a condensation of Dr. Coffin's lectures in Ethics at Earlham College, and approaches the problem of morals from the social point of view.

The fundamental thesis of the book is that while morality is ultimately a personal affair, personality is ultimately a social affair; therefore the moral situation is always directly or indirectly social in nature. After an analysis of "socialized personality" the moral problems which arise in connection with the institutions of society—the home, school, vocation, state, and church—are discussed in the light of the "socialized conscience."

While the book is designed primarily as an elementary text in Ethics, the general reader will find it non-technical, clear, and interesting. It throws much light on many of the social service problems that our people are now attacking, and those interested in this phase of our work will do well to read it. The book sells for $1.25.

ONE HUNDRED AND FOUR

Mary Douglas Goddard of Brunswick, Maine, one of our subscribers who greatly enjoys THE AMERICAN FRIEND and who can still read some in it, passed her 104th milestone the 10th. She is an esteemed and much loved elder in Durham (Maine) Friends Meeting which she attended until a year and a half ago, sitting on the platform and almost invariably speaking in praise of Him who saved her and of her longing for others' salvation.

On her birthday quite a gathering of Friends and others met in her home to join their prayers and testimonies with hers to Him who had so long upheld her by His grace. Albert F. Minott and Cyrus Cartland, ministers of her meeting had charge of the service. Songs of praise were sung. Alice May Douglas, State Superintendent of Peace in the W. C. T. U., read an original poem entitled "What Hath God Wrought." Many gifts of flowers, fruit, money, postcards and other things gladdened her birthday. Several lunched with her.

She is a sister of Nathan Douglas, a fearless herald of the gospel for seventy years, who visited in the love of Christ the Western Yearly Meetings many years ago. He died in 1904 in the triumph of faith, aged 92 years.

Died

Stratton.—Anna E. Stratton died at Long Beach, California, February 8, 1914, in her eighty-second year. She took an active interest in all the work of the Church, and was faithful in attending its services. She was a teacher in early life and for a time was governess in Earlham College. Later she was matron in an orphans' home in Indianapolis. Her dependence was upon a crucified Redeemer.

WANTED TO KNOW

The Truth About Grape-Nuts Food

It doesn't matter so much what you hear about a thing, it's what you know that counts. And correct knowledge is most likely to come from personal experience.

"About a year ago," writes a N. Y. man, "I was bothered by indigestion, especially during the forenoon. I tried several remedies without any permanent improvement.

"My breakfast usually consisted of oatmeal, steak or chops, bread, coffee and some fruit.

"Hearing so much about Grape-Nuts, I concluded to give it a trial and find out if all I had heard of it was true.

"So I began with Grape-Nuts and cream, soft boiled eggs, toast, a cup of Postum and some fruit. Before the end of the first week I was rid of the acidity of the stomach and felt much relieved.

"By the end of the second week all traces of indigestion had disappeared and I was in first rate health once more. Before beginning this course of diet, I never had any appetite for lunch, but now I can enjoy the meal at noon time."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

A Chart of the Life of Christ.

In a concise and orderly arrangement of five columns the entire life of Christ as recorded in the four Gospels is shown giving every reference in the Gospels. It presents at a glance every event in the order of its occurrence so far as the scholars have been able to determine such order and is therefore a great time saver.

A pastor in another denomination says, "It is just what we want, just where we want it. Its five-column arrangement admirably overcomes the confusion naturally arising from the various incidents being mentioned in different order in the Gospels."

The Way of Hope

MARCUS EMORY GUNN

I had a vision of a place,
A woman's form, an angel's face;
But when her smile full on me fell,
Doubt intervened as if to dwell
Insinuating that fair Hope
Had neither being, place, nor scope;—
But, when I saw the hope-light beam
Intenser like some changeful dream,
All doubt was lost in radiant air,
Fair Hope herself envisioned there.

Hope's hand, a shapely, slender thing,
Then quick began its beckoning
The massive mount on which she stood,
Towering aloft a many a rood.

With deepest yearnings of my heart,
Made captive by her artless art,
Gliding, I gained that altitude
And seemed to taste seraphic food;
The sweet fruition of desire
A modulated holy fire.

Hope's hand I hold as one espoused
Till her fixed gaze my fears aroused:—
Her fair lips moved, they seem to say:
"With us there is no holiday;
We work and strive the while we live,
And live that we may work and strive;
The purpose of the strict ideal
Is that in life we make it real,
And ne'er an evanescent thing,
Though whiter than an angel's wing."
Her words had end, her form withdrawn,
And e'en the mount dissolved and gone;
My face was swept as by her breath,
My soul renewed as if from death.

The World Conference Commission Calls for a Truce of God Throughout Christendom

MARCH 21, 1914.

To Our Christian Brethren in Every Land,

Greeting:

We, the Advisory Committee, representatives by appointment of many Churches in the United States, have become associated with the Commission of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the preparation of a World Conference on questions of Faith and Order as a first step towards unity. We believe in the one people of God throughout the world. We believe that now is a critically hopeful time for the world to become Christian. We believe that the present world-problems of Christianity call for a world-conference of Christians.

This proposal has already received the approval and co-operation of a large number of Christian Churches; approaches are being made to others as rapidly as possible; so that we hope that ere long its world-wide representative character will be established beyond peradventure. In the work of preparation for its convening, we have no authority or desire to enter into a discussion of the important questions which the Conference itself will meet to consider. It is our immediate concern to take whatever measures may be advisable to secure the best possible presentation to the Conference of the matters to be considered. In so doing we cannot, however, remain indifferent to present conditions which may either promote or tend to thwart the purposes and hopes which the approaching World Conference should fulfill.

At the present moment some of these important issues have suddenly become matters of renewed controversy. From the mission field the long outstanding problem of Christian unity has been brought by the providence of God, and set directly in the way before all Christian communions. It cannot longer be passed by. The great interests which Christian people of every name have most at heart call for its solution. But solution cannot be secured by surrender. It must be preceded by conference. Before conference there must be truce. The love of Christ for the world constrains us to ask you to join with us and with His disciples of every name in proclaiming among the churches throughout Christendom a truce of God. Let the questions that have troubled us be fairly and clearly stated. Let scholars, Catholic and Protestant, give freely to the people whatever light from their historical studies they can throw over these subjects. More than that, it is of essential importance for us to seek to understand what in the religious experience of others are the things of real value which they would not lose, and which should be conserved in the one household of faith. We pray also that each Christian communion may avoid, so far as possible, any controversial declaration of its own position in relation to others, but rather that all things be said and done as if in preparation for the coming together of faithful disciples from every nation and tongue to implore a fresh outpouring of God's Holy Spirit.

Before all indifference, doubt and misgivings, we would hold up the belief that the Lord's prayer for the oneness of His disciples was intended to be fulfilled; and that it ought not to be impossible in the comprehension of the Church, as it is practicable in the State, for men of various temperaments and divergent convictions to dwell together on agreed principles of unity. We would, therefore, urge all who hold positions of leadership or authority in the Church to labor without ceasing to work out in this generation, by mutual recognitions and possible readjustments, a practical basis of unity in liberty, in order, in truth, in power and in peace. To this end we ask your prayers.

By order of the Advisory Committee of the Commissions on the World Conference on Faith and Order.

WILLIAM T. MANNING, Chairman.

ROBERT H. GARDINER, Secretary.

The Local Option Election in Richmond

The local option election at Richmond, Indiana, on March 24th, resulted disastrously for the temperance forces, the "wet" majority being 1341. There has been such wide spread interest among Friends in this contest, on account of Richmond being the headquarters of the Five Years Meeting, that it is not improper to give the subject more than a passing notice.

The campaign was undertaken following a great religious awakening as the result of a tabernacle revival campaign, which closed on February first with more than sixteen hundred professed conversions. Five years ago Richmond had voted "wet" in a county option campaign by 1869 majority, a result which staggered the temperance element and brought lasting discouragement.

This year when the religious conscience of the city had been awakened, the first manifestation was an apparent universal demand among the better citizenship for another chance to vote on the saloon question. After careful investigation, the temperance forces decided to bring on a vote by petition, and arrangements were made to keep the tabernacle for the public meetings. These were a feature of the campaign, the people gathering by the thousands to hear some of the best temperance speakers on the American platform.

The liquor interests sent to Iowa and brought back to Richmond a former local editor to conduct their publicity campaign. The "wets" held no meetings, and had nothing to say throughout the campaign except through their paid writer, who in advertisements put forth the boldest claims of obedience to the law on the part of the fifty-six saloons of the city.

The temperance people endeavored to develop an ideal organization and succeeded in taking two polls of the city, which proved more or less inaccurate, because as the sequel showed, hundreds of men said one thing and voted another. The machinery of an ideal organization was perfected, which was later handicapped by the lack of enough men to do the personal work required.

A more formidable organization was developed, however, than the returns would indicate, especially on election day, but for which the majority for the liquor interests would have been much larger. It was evident from the start that the liquor men would spare no expense to win the election, and this good old so-called "Quaker City" has been humiliated by the evidences of the grossest corruption. About ninety foreigners, mostly Italians, were hurriedly naturalized, and in certain instances there is testimony that the law had been violated.

Reports of the misuse of money were rife, the expenditure by the liquor interests reaching fabulous sums, and it is believed that hundreds of votes were influenced in this way. Testimony to this effect was ready to be put in the form of affidavits, and evidence of law violations in other directions was placed before the prosecutor, who decided not to approve any affidavits if made to the court, but to wait for a grand jury investigation after the election was over. Thus the temperance forces were handicapped on election day, and opportunities for fraud were made use of. It is believed that several hundred illegal votes were cast by persons who were brought in for that purpose, and who had no legal residence in the city.

But with all that Richmond is "wet," and already the natural harvest is being reaped. High-class citizens have been insulted and hooted at on the streets, a thing we have never seen before in any other city.

With few exceptions so far as is known, the Friends of Richmond threw themselves whole-heartedly into the campaign to make this a better city. They were prominent in organization work and refused to yield to the intimidation that was practiced upon the business interests of the city with brazen effrontery.

Yet with all the handicaps the "drys" increased their vote by 749 over five years ago as against an increase in the "wet" vote of only 221. The lesson to be learned by Richmond is the lesson which many cities need to learn throughout the Republic. There needs to be a constructive system of education that will awaken both the civic and business conscience, and show the commercial interests that in this enlightened age commercial prosperity cannot longer thrive with the open saloon.

The face of the nation is set toward the annihilation of the liquor traffic, and any community that hugs it to its bosom will soon find itself hopelessly entangled in coils that threaten both its happiness and its prosperity. Alcohol has won another temporary victory, and its advocates are jubilant in their glee. But when this city and other cities take a sober second thought, they will realize in their deepest consciousness that the price of such a victory is too dear for the citizenship to pay. There will be a battle lost now and then, but we will not lose the war. The saloon must go.

What is Church Loyalty?

BY MARY M. HOBBS

For a good many years the matter of church loyalty was more or less a puzzle to me. I could see clearly that in other churches the superimposed decrees of their hierarchies, together with their iron-bound creeds, gave a very substantial backing for church loyalty of a kind which in not the slightest degree appealed to me.

The indwelling Holy Spirit, the immediate individual guidance of the same being the foundation of the Society of Friends, it rather appeared to me that when we were maintaining this doctrine and acting upon it, we were in fact manifesting our loyalty to the denomination. All of which about amounts to "doing that which was right in their own sight."

The thing that now astonishes me is not that we suffered so many squabbles and separations, but that we remained together at all. With each person as an embryo Pope and fully convinced that an adherence to his own convictions was the all-important thing, it is marvelous that there should have been so much unity. It speaks volumes for the power of the Spirit and volumes for the Christian graces of the Society. The lovely manner of those in opposition "being in subjection" to the prevailing decisions has many a time been the most tendering and cementing thing in the whole transaction.

For several years now I have seen things quite differently, and while not in the least abandoning "the root of the goodly tree" of our belief, I see quite clearly that the earthen vessel influences the variations of our magnetic needle; and in order that these inaccuracies may be eliminated, we need the careful comparison with the position of other needles. I will say, too, that what altered my view was the study of psychology. It was not any immediate revelation, but the divine guidance, in my case, of a small amount of scientific knowledge. What follows is as nearly as I can state it, the conclusion at which I have arrived.

In what does church loyalty consist? Is it an adherence to ancient forms and to the creeds of bygone days? If so, the ever-present, abiding guidance of our God is abrogated. Do we maintain that the framers of the creeds and the establishers of the forms and ceremonies were wise for all time? Then we announce ourselves by that very position to be Roman Catholics in faith, if not in doctrine. We take our stand upon authority and not upon a continuous direct guidance, which stand makes of us Catholics and not Protestants in fact and in spirit. As Protestants we believe in a progressive revelation, and this is the only sensible attitude to maintain, as it enables us while developing with the present still to connect ourselves livingly with the past. We must believe that Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, today and forever; indeed we must, but we cannot help knowing that the human apprehension of Him and of His teaching advances as men become more and more like Him, more and more actuated by His spirit.

When we study closely the lives of some of the most heroic leaders of religious thought in past ages, we cannot but be shocked at the crudity and even barbarity of some of their positions. Luther, the great emancipator, was himself far from emancipated, and his treatment of the poor during the Peasants' War was simply barbarous. Calvin was terrible, ordering Servetus to be burned at the stake, commanding a child's head to be cut off because it struck its mother, etc. George Fox believed in witches; and the great Erasmus for fear of offending high patrons deserted his dying friend. It is a thankless task to pick flaws in great men, and these were every one, valiant souls, hewing the way for human freedom, but subject to the limitations of their times, infinitely in advance of the bestial Popes who sat on Peter's throne and dictated to the world. Slowly and with halting steps the church advances toward her Master's position. The most deadening thing which could happen would be to decide that it had already attained or was already made perfect.

If our religion is not a progressive, dynamic religion, it is not one which should command the loyalty of people who live in the successive advancing cycles of apprehension. Neither will it answer the question to say that church loyalty is loyalty to Jesus Christ. Necessarily this is included; and in the broad bond of Christian brotherhood, this is the keynote; but in our working systems this alone is not sufficient. Every Christian church contains souls loyal to Christ, but this, important though it be, is not a mark of differentiation. Perhaps the time will come when this again will be enough, but at present we are divided into working squads, and, if we are to ever bring about the time when the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters do the sea, there must be coherence and unity of effort in each. We must then believe that God is still leading His people by a progressive revelation, and that to whatever church we belong it is our duty to be loyal in order that that part of the work upon which we are set may not lag behind.

Hence, I conclude that church loyalty means loyalty alty to the decisions of that branch of the church militant to which we belong; co-operation with the conclusions arrived at by the consensus of religious opinion, whether this be in conferences, synods, presbytery, councils, Five Years meeting, or our own yearly meetings. It means something to be a soldier and march in the ranks. If we are any good, we must be to be depended upon to help carry out the plans of the campaign.

We Friends have been so loosely organized; we have had such latitude for the operation of individual guidance, and we have carried this to such extremes, that we have missed the compact advance of the phalanx and rather straggled along in our ranks and endured many separations and much bickering. Some of our ancient customs have outlasted their days of usefulness and have become a stumbling block and a handicap in times when we should have been marching shoulder to shoulder to oppose the enemy. One of these I have mentioned, the exaggerated importance of personal infallibility in divine guidance. This has caused all kinds of vagaries, and while we have followed will-o-the-wisps into bogs, our main duties have been distressingly abandoned. Another which I am bound to put into the same class is, our manner of settling things in meeting "by weight" and often allowing one or two persons to block the course of progress. I do not yet believe in settling things by vote except in delegated bodies, but they should be decided by what is the sense of the meeting; that is, by the settled belief of the interested membership expressed, which in our time about amounts to the opinion of the majority. Times were when there were few of what we could call intelligent members in meetings, and it was needful to adhere to a kind of patriarchal authority. This condition exists no longer and the thought and ability of all should be used by the church for its upbuilding and advancement.

Hence, when a measure has been adopted after careful Christian investigation and discussion, it becomes the policy of the denomination, and should have the support of the membership. This I take to be church loyalty.

Now, if, after a course of action has been decided upon as above indicated and members refuse to conform to the general modus operandi, are they not separatists? Are they not claiming a leading superior to the consensus of religious opinion? This is disloyalty; and through their influence and example the solidarity of effort is wrecked.

I quite recognize the fact that some persons may find it difficult to submit, but I fully believe that it is better under such circumstances to hold one's own judgment in obedience than to become a kicker in the ranks. If you are right, the course of events will ere long justify your position and in the meantime, you will not be losing your influence by testifying against the decisions of your meeting.

Let us now consider a matter which has given and is giving the church much concern—the financing of our various activities. It is indeed a momentous thing, and I believe that one reason why we are not coming up to the help of the Lord in any adequate way as a church is because we are attempting to "open the future's portals with the past's (time) rusted key." The methods which seem wisest now are not those which we imagine the early Friends used. They gave as it seemed good to them, we fancy, and since it does not seem good to us we do not give. That is about where those stand who are unwilling to adopt the methods which their meetings recommend.

There is another handicap. As Friends, I sometimes think that we have become so accustomed to having things done for us without money and without price that we have suffered a kind of atrophy of the hump of benevolence and depend upon those who have larger means and a more generous spirit, and certain ones who are readier to endure hardness for the sake of preaching the Gospel, to bear the burdens we all should share.

The Catholic Church is rich not from the large donations of the wealthy, but from the constant contributions of the many. And it is in this way alone that we shall ever be able to meet the oncoming and increasing opportunities for service. We need to learn to "play the game," to co-operate and to co-operate systematically, so we can be depended upon, and not to show our loyalty in a haphazard, intermittent manner. We are improving, but we need to hasten our steps. Contributions to our meetings should be a part of our religious exercise; contributions in service and no less contributions of money to help carry on those lines of service in which the meeting is engaged. Nothing short of this can we claim as church loyalty.

Our support of our church paper comes under this same head. Churches cannot do their work in our day without their denominational organs, and it is for us to see to it that the paper which has been adopted by the Five Years Meeting as its mouthpiece shall have our subscriptions. In no other way can it be published. There is no Fortunatus purse behind THE AMERICAN FRIEND. The constituency of the allied meetings must be loyal to it or it goes under.

We need a baptism of loyalty, of patriotism, of enthusiasm, for the cause we have been professing to represent. If we could only all be persuaded that every one of us is a necessary unit and in this belief willingly contribute our part, the grand whole would come up gloriously, and our General Secretary would be writing articles of thanksgiving instead of the perplexed appeal which has recently reached us. May God hasten the day.

Guilford College, North Carolina.

Family Worship

BY JOHN S. KIMBER

God originated the home. He "setteth the desolate in families." Parents are commanded to bring up their children "in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." It seems but a near step from a Christian home into Heaven itself. Our nation, every nation, needs more such homes. Jesus was once a child and He always loved children. They appealed to him. He laid His hands upon them and took them in His arms. He said, putting one in the midst, "of such is the kingdom of heaven." A spiritual Church is like a family, there are fathers and mothers "in Israel." There are babes needing the "sincere milk of the word." Children, both natural and spiritual, are an "heritage of the Lord." They are "arrows"; our "quivers" should "be full of them." The Jews were commanded to teach their children God's law, and the things which their eyes had seen of His statutes and judgments. They were to teach them even to their sons' sons. They were to talk of them when sitting down and when walking by the way, "When thou risest up, and when thou liest down."

How many a young man might have escaped "the snare of the fowler" had he been taught to read and obey God's word. We should read it as a family at least once daily, and then there should be a season of devotion in which all may be able to take a vocal part. The children should remember prayers that were offered by their parents; and no child however small should be shut out, but rather encouraged (as the Spirit touches the heart) to take part. Often "a little child will lead them," and a closeness will spring up at the family altar that could be brought about in no other way. The sweetest remembrance will be had of it, a Divine fragrance will seem to permeate even the thought of it; and this will only be deepened (not dissipated) by the removal of either a parent or a child. This prayer circle will prove a mighty source of power, so that the effect of it upon the day will be missed when it is not held. The father will get so that he will almost fear to go to business without having it; it will lighten the cares of a busy house-wife. Even the children will feel its spell and power. A boy at college, I have read, once wrote home a request to be remembered at the family prayers, for said he to his father, "I know God answers the prayers that are offered there!" It is said that two ungodly brothers once undertook to tear down the old homestead and build it anew. Each avoided a certain spot and wanted the other to tear it down, neither would do so. This spot was where their father had kneeled down and prayed for them. At last they went to the place together, and kneeling down there prayed to their father's God.

We have a promise that applies to family prayer, and makes its power irresistible—"Where two are agreed as asking anything upon earth, it shall be done of my Father which is in heaven."

From every stormy wind that blows,
From every swelling tide of woes;
There is a calm, a sure retreat,
'Tis found beneath the mercy-seat.

There is a place where spirits blend,
Where friend holds intercourse with friend;
Tho' sundered far by faith they meet,
Around one common mercy-seat.

There is a place where Jesus sheds
The oil of gladness on our heads;
A place than all besides more sweet,
It is the Blood-bought mercy-seat.

Abraham "commanded" his family aright, and was commended therefor by God. When he sought a bride for his son Isaac, prayer was made concerning that most important matter, and in all the annals of history is there a sweeter love story than that of Isaac and Rebecca?

Lot, in his grasping greed, seems to have neglected the privileges of a true Christian home, and paid the price in a wife destroyed for a heart that yearned for worldly things, sons-in-law that mocked at his warnings, and daughters that headed descendants that were at enmity with God, and a curse to the world.

Family prayers bring a sweet sense of protection to the home. They are like the Blood of old, sprinkled upon the door; all the sweetness of the promises of the 91st Psalm seem to hover over this hallowed spot. If our children learn naught else for the homes that they will some day have, this alone will be enough to shed an hallowed influence long after we have gone, and continue its mighty work to children yet unborn. Is it not in fact the best heritage that we could possibly leave to them, exceeding that of wealth or worldly fame? At one time feeling the need of legal advice, a lawyer who is now a distinguished judge called upon me by appointment. He was shown into the reception room at the time of our morning devotions. When my immediate part in these was finished, I withdrew from the dining room to see him. He could hear the voices in the next room and said, "Were you having prayers?" I replied that we were, but that I personally had finished. "But," he said, "let us wait"—and in spite of the great value of his time and the pressing day that may have been before him, he reverently bowed his head until the last child had prayed, nor would he turn his hand to the business for which he had come.

What safety the family prayers may throw about the absent ones! A classmate of mine told me that he went one day to get a letter at a postoffice then undergoing repair. As he stopped near the door to read the letter received, a stone fell that might have caused his death had he been about one step behind the spot where he stood. The seriousness of his escape made him thoughtful, and a little time afterwards he received a letter from a sister who was in the custom of faithfully praying for him, asking him where he was on a certain time upon a certain day because then she had received an impulse to retire and pray for him. This, he told me, was just the hour in which he had been delivered from the impending doom.

There was a time when Friends were more particular than they are now about the reading of God's word in the family. I make a plea that the custom be revived, accompanied with vocal prayer where the Spirit so leads. "Are the Holy Scriptures daily read in our families, giving time for reverent waiting on the Lord, and do you encourage the children under your care to read and study them?" is a good query, and should be kept alive amongst us. If more Friends would go from family devotions direct to the meeting house, perhaps there would be fewer silent meetings. And the more time we spend in family and secret prayer, the better qualified we are to be of service to our fellow men.

Methinks the home at Bethany, where Mary sat at Jesus' feet and chose the part that should not be taken away from her, might well be reproduced today, and those who are cumbered with "much serving" might here find rest. Yea, and that those who are "dead in trespasses and sin" might here find life, and hear those blessed words, "loose him and let him go."

God grant that upon us may never fall the imprecation of Jeremiah when he said, "Pour out thy fury upon the heathen, and upon the families that call not on thy Name."

A Monthly Meeting Chronicle

(Wherein is told the story of a Monthly Meeting which caught a vision, and with some misgivings decided to improve an opportunity.)

BY JUNIUS JUNIOR

XII.

The revival spirit had taken possession of Slow Valley Meeting. For many weeks a widening vision of responsibility, individually and collectively, had sent many a member to the secret closet of prayer for Divine help and guidance. Gradually the selfish spirit had been supplanted by the consciousness of brotherhood. Men and women were coming to understand that the vital element in their Christian life was discipleship.

In harmony with the growing interest in the welfare of the meeting and the community, there had developed an anxiety about the spiritual life not only of the membership, but of every family within the circle of the meeting's influence. Family visitation and personal activity had brought their natural fruition in the serious, thoughtful attitude of many who for years had given no thought to the religious life.

The Holy Spirit was finding open channels to many hearts, and it needed no prophetic vision to reveal the fact that the time was ripe for a revival effort in the community. On Thanksgiving Day at a special service, the members of the congregation felt the touch of a Divine fervor, and went on their knees in a consecration service of preparation for the great work that was before them. For more than two weeks a special series of meetings had been in progress, led at first by the pastor and resident minister, and for the past week by a visiting evangelist. At every service the gospel of a whole salvation was being preached, and many were coming under its influence.

Forty-two conversions were reported up to the time when the December session of the Monthly Meeting convened and the entire church was being revived under the operation of Divine truth. The absence of hysteria was remarked, and there was nothing of that sensational excitement that sometimes has brought reproach upon evangelism. The example of a meeting which had set out to win the community for Christ was finding its response in an awakening that was felt in almost every home. Religion was the topic of conversation everywhere, and even the other churches were feeling the revivalistic influence. It was the culmination of the spirit that had been operating in Slow Valley Meeting ever since our friend the merchant had dared to voice a conviction that the congregation was in a rut and was not measuring up to its opportunities or fulfilling its obligations. The light of truth, smothered at first by custom and by conservatism, had at last broken into a flame. The meeting was entering into its rightful heritage; was becoming as a city set upon a hill that could not be hid, and was doing what every religious congregation ought to do,—justifying its existence by an endeavor to reveal the spirit of Christ in saving power to a normal community.

The devotional service of the Monthly Meeting was one long to be remembered. Never had the meeting witnessed such an attendance at a business session, and seldom had it ever heard such a message of power as came from the lips of the visiting minister. It was a call to a higher life; a call that awakened a new sense of responsibility in every heart, a call that revealed a new vision of the mighty tasks to which God is calling His Church. When finally the Clerk read the opening minute, the spirit of devotion was still prevalent, and a new importance seemed to be attached to the business of the Church.

Aside from the reception of new members and the satisfactory report of progress in the new Sabbath School at the Bennett school-house and in the Christian Endeavor Society, two subjects claimed the major part of attention. One was the subject of the every-member canvass which it had been felt by the Committee could be conducted to better advantage on the preceding Sabbath. As the result of the calls that had been made on that day, promises of contributions had been secured which would increase the income for current expenses about twenty-seven per cent.; for foreign missions, thirty-six per cent.; while other Committees that had never had an income except a nominal appropriation by the Monthly Meeting, were assured of substantial support that would enable them to enter upon aggressive lines of service. This was especially true of the Home Missions, the Bible School and the Christian Endeavor Committees. The Committee reported further that the canvassers had not been able to see every family, but that as this was a temporary canvass, the meeting should look forward to a more accurate and permanent canvass next March when the United Mission Campaign was to culminate.

In this connection the Committee on internal organism reported that until the Yearly Meeting should take action, there was little that could be done in a permanent way in the matter of combining departments of work, but suggested that an experiment be tried the coming year, subject to the approval of the Quarterly Meeting. This was to the effect that two general Committees be named, one to have charge through sub-committees, of the work within the meeting, such as Pastoral care, Bible School, Christian Endeavor, Education, prayer meeting, invitation and visitation and ushers; and the other to have a care over work for others, such as Evangelistic, Foreign Missions, Home Missions, including work among the foreigners, social service or community work, temperance, and the various kinds of federated service which required the co-operation of all the religious elements of the city and community.

It was explained in support of the proposition that by such methods duplication of effort could be largely avoided, and where emphasis needed to be laid in any one direction at any time, the combined efforts of several departments could be centered through the influence of the Central Committee with a minimum of cost and a maximum of efficiency. It was argued that the processes of service in the Church should be simplified, and at the same time, be better and more systematically organized. Some felt, however, that under this plan certain departments would receive too little emphasis, but the advocates of the proposition replied that on the contrary, each department would receive new inspiration by being under a general managing board, and the work to be done would be more surely performed if it were under the direction of a Central Committee that could direct the operations of several departments of kindred importance in harmonious relationships.

It was evident, however, that sentiment was not united in favor of the proposition, and the subject was referred to the next Monthly Meeting for further consideration. The pastor gave notice that while he regretted to leave the meeting, he felt that the time had come for him to go elsewhere, which he was planning to do the first of the year. There were many expressions of regret at this action, for he was a lovable man, yet there was an unexpressed feeling that the new situation demanded pastoral care with a wider vision and larger capability than was possible under his leadership. Announcement was made that the revival services would continue indefinitely, and the Clerk called attention to the fact that all Committees were expected to make their annual reports at the January meeting. Following this the concluding minute was read, the resident minister led in prayer, and the congregation went to their homes under a pervading sense of the overshadowing presence of the Holy Spirit.

"Character is what a man is as God sees him. There is no sham or pretense about it. Souls stand naked always before God. How silly and futile, in the light of this burning truth, seem all our miserable pretenses and subterfuges by which we seek to appear before men to be what we really are not."—Young People's Paper.

The Moral Appeal Against the War Spirit

BY HAROLD E. TRENT

Some years have now elapsed since Norman Angell started his campaign against wars; his aim seemingly to show that quite apart from moral aspect, there is a great misunderstanding as to the commercial value of war. For some time past I have realized that the views of Norman Angell were being unduly labored, and I trust now and in the future we may make our appeal from and to a higher plane.

I would not have it supposed that the point of view assumed by Norman Angell has not done an immense amount of good; for it has undoubtedly attracted the attention of many who could not be approached on other lines of thought, and one feels that so rapid has been the spread of the belief of war being uncommercial and an inefficient method of settling differences, that the danger is now that people will not appreciate the fact that war is not so much a cause as a result.

The causes of wars are well known, a few of the most prominent being selfishness and greed both national and individual; these characteristics are worse than the result, i. e., war.

We do not want people to give up war and war-like arts because they are dangerous, uncommercial, and because they make great demands on the health, wealth and happiness of the community. These reasons are unworthy, and however necessary they may have been in the past, we must have none of them now. Peace gained for such sordid ends would bring about selfishness and general corruption in perhaps a worse form than war.

Let us be quite ready to admit some of the claims of the upholders of national armies and navies. We can well afford to do so. That war calls forth and maintains a love of country, supreme courage and resourcefulness, the spread of civilization (at a purely monetary valuation, be it noted); that commercial prosperity and a large measure of personal safety have resulted. We must realize that there is a measure of truth in these statements, and we cannot then be surprised that the details of wars are commemorated in stone and bronze all the world over.

We must frankly tell those who differ from us to wear the sword as long as they can and couple with it our belief, that war is immoral, that it is not an honest contest that pits brute force against moral worth; that it holds back the forces of civilization. Civilization has come from afar and will only advance as the educated intelligence of the people recognizes that it is now, whatever it may have been in the past, not in war but in peace, that progress is at all possible.

We do not want it to be supposed that we espouse the cause of peace as a sort of insurance policy against the privations of war. We must be ready to endure all the possible privations, dangers and inconveniences met with in war with a nobleness not inferior to the most warlike men, because we may have to suffer for our convictions. Are we prepared to do it?

The world requires a leader; who will dare?

Current Items of Interest to Friends

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING

Cadiz.—John Reddick, of Arba, Indiana, came to this place and began a series of meetings on March 8th, which continued until March 22d. While there were not as many conversions as we had hoped for, many were reclaimed and much good was done. His messages were clear and pointed and were well received. We thank God for sending our brother this way, and believe that the seed that has been sown has fallen upon good ground, and will yet bring forth fruit for the Master.

Spiceland.—Spiceland Quarterly Meeting was held March 13-15. The Meeting on Ministry and Oversight on Friday morning was small, but all other sessions were well attended. Enos Harvey, of Bloomingdale, Indiana, was present with a minute, and on Saturday and Sabbath mornings delivered messages which were clear and convincing. Charles Tebbetts gave an address on foreign missions on Sabbath evening.

At Monthly Meeting held on February 7, eight young men were received into membership. At the morning service on the 15, the congregation gave them a welcome, and the pastor preached a sermon suited to the occasion. It was an encouraging service to all present.

Muncie.—The Friendly Helpers' Class, a Bible class of busy mothers at Muncie, observed the sixth anniversary of the class on March 12th. There are eighty-one members on the roll, an increase of thirty-seven the past year. Twenty-seven joined church during the year. $209.67 was given to mission work; $46.02 to the Bible School, and $26.00 to the church as a thank offering. Thirty pot flowers and twenty-four bouquets of cut flowers were sent to the sick, and twelve sprays were given at funerals. 1,666 visits were paid to the sick and in the interest of the church. The sum of $25.07 was collected at monthly socials, which was spent for flowers for the sick.

Van Wert, Ohio.—The Ladies' Foreign Missionary Society of Van Wert Meeting met at the home of Mrs. Thad Atkinson on March 13. About twenty-five were present. This Society organized a year ago with seven members, and now more than twenty are enrolled, and all are active and enthusiastic in the work. The Society is studying "The King's Business." Mrs. Tormohlen, wife of the pastor, is the leader.

Marion.—Milford H. Lyons, the noted evangelist, held a series of union meetings the first six weeks of the year in Marion, resulting in about 3,000 conversions, a generous proportion of whom have united with the First Friends' Church. Charles E. Hiatt, the pastor, afterward held a two weeks' meeting, which was very successful. Quite a number were converted. At the last monthly meeting, 185 names of those applying for membership were read and accepted, and since that time others have applied, making in all about 195 who have been added to the church, including thirty-five whole families and a large proportion of adults. The most of these were present in the monthly meeting, entering heartily into the devotional part of the service and remaining for the business session. The house is filled at nearly all the services each week, and great interest is manifested, both by new members and by many who have been in nominal membership with us, but have recently renewed their vows and are now actively engaged in the work of the church. A Junior Christian Endeavor Society has been organized by Mrs. G. B. O'Neil, and is well attended by an enthusiastic throng of little folks. The Sunday School has almost doubled, the adult classes especially having greatly increased in numbers and interest. On March 15, 447 were present, the collection amounting to about $11.00.

On Wednesday, March 18, the Missionary Society personally invited every woman of the church to an all-day missionary meeting held at the church. At noon a bountiful dinner was served. About 150 women were present.

On Sunday evening, March 22, a public welcome was extended to all new members, with an address by W. E. Darter on behalf of the Sunday School; by Mrs. C. E. Hiatt, president of the Missionary Society; by Mrs. Frances Osborn, president of the Ladies' Aid Society; by Fred Lillard, representing the Christian Endeavor Society, and by E. C. Hiatt, on behalf of the church as a whole. Responses were made by two of the new members, Mrs. Ray Leamon and Patrolman Chance Hardy. At this meeting the S. R. O. sign could have been truthfully displayed, and enthusiasm and good fellowship were manifested by all. The church is rejoicing in its new life and vigor and we feel that we can truly say,

"The Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we are glad."

Fairmount.—The sessions of Fairmount Quarterly Meeting were fraught with unusual blessing to many persons attending. Jefferson W. Ford, Westfield, Indiana, a returned missionary from Jamaica; Charles E. Hiatt and Frank Stanley, of Marion, Vincent Nicholson, Field Secretary for Earlham College, and Arthur Williams, of Elwood, Indiana, were acceptably in attendance. Jefferson Ford was the principal speaker in the ministry on Seventh-day. On Sabbath morning he went to Bethel, six miles in the country; to Jonesboro in the afternoon, and back to Fairmount at night. His messages were very much appreciated at all these places. Messages of sympathy and love were sent to Ira C. Johnson, Yearly Meeting Evangelistic Superintendent, who is very sick, and to two of our own prominent members who were lying at the point of death. By a unanimous vote the Quarterly Meeting ordered a petition sent to Congress asking that a prohibition amendment to the national constitution be speedily passed.

Fairmount local meeting has completed an every member canvass for its local annual financial budget and for foreign missions. Twenty-four busy men made the canvass mostly on Wednesday afternoon. Two of these men are proprietors of stores and the others are all busy men. They organized on the apostolic plan, going two and two. The result is that the local expenses will be met with less difficulty than formerly, and $175.00 more is pledged for missions than has ever been given for the general work by the meeting. The duplex envelope will be used and weekly payments made by the contributors. In almost every instance the individual subscribed more than the former assessment had been, and usually designated that the increase should go to missions. Several men have subscribed from five to twenty cents per week who had never before given to missions. Several have subscribed from two cents up to ten cents per week for local work who had not formerly been assessed. Many whole families ordered envelopes for each person in the family. The congregation is well pleased with the plan and its results.

Possibly one of the causes for the ease with which the every-member canvass met with success was the gracious revival that was held by Lindley A. Wells in January. He is a pastoral evangelist and does his revival work from that point of view. He urges the members to give liberally of their means to the support of the church, including the general work of the meeting, to the pastor and for foreign missions, if they would enjoy a keen spiritual life and experience. He also preaches that Christianity is a social religion and that all churches should meet frequently in a social gathering for the development and acquaintance of all the members in a social way. Fairmount was in need of just such preaching from just such an evangelist, who also preaches that holiness is of as great importance to the church today as conversion. As a result of such preaching, many members of the meeting are deeper in their spiritual life, and the young people have reorganized the Christian Endeavor with many new active members. The weekly prayer meetings of the church are pulsating with spiritual life and fellowship.

Portland.—Portland Quarterly Meeting convened March 14 and 15th. Asa Woodard of Western Yearly Meeting, Levi Cox of Winchester Quarter, Vincent Nicholson of Richmond, and Ellis A. Wells of Upland, together with workers from Winchester, and ministers of the Quarterly Meeting and a goodly number of delegates from the different congregations, gave us a great quarterly meeting. It was a real spiritual feast. The business was unusual in interest and harmony, with George R. Wright and Lizzie Watson clerks, who handled the business in a beautiful way.

Dinner was served at the church and the social feature of the afternoon was a great favor. Vincent Nicholson spoke at both morning and evening services on First-day. His teaching was of a most logic and practical kind and calculated to establish members in practical Christian living, and was a great uplift to the meeting. The outlook for the future is very encouraging.

Class No. 9, taught by Alice J. Lewis and composed of young married people is building up rapidly. They are thoroughly organized and meet once a month to lay plans, transact business pertaining to their special work and to enjoy the social benefits. Thirty-one were present on the evening of March 18th at the home of Orlo K. Wright, including O. B. Manes, Superintendent, and Tennyson Lewis, the pastor. A few were absent on account of sickness. This class is working hard to get people to the Bible School and church, and their earnestness promises to be of valuable service to the entire school and meeting.

We find our building is entirely inadequate to accommodate the growing school with its future prospects.

IOWA YEARLY MEETING

Casey.—Howard Brown, of Earlham, Iowa, delivered two stereopticon illustrated lectures on "The History of Friends," and on "Peace," Monday and Tuesday evenings, March 16 and 17, to appreciative audiences at the Canby Church. We can only voice the sentiment of the people when we say that his lecture on "Peace" is in a class by itself, and is a superior production.

Spring Valley, Minnesota.—A revival meeting was conducted for four weeks at this place, with the pastor, Estella Stanley McCann in charge. Some additional workers came in answer to prayer and "helped us out." Some definite work was accomplished and family altars were erected. After a few days' rest, the pastor and her husband went to South Troy and conducted an old-time revival for the Wesleyan Methodists. From there they went to Zumbro Falls and conducted a union revival for the Methodist and Congregational Churches, lasting two weeks. About sixty knelt at the altar.

KANSAS YEARLY MEETING

Prairie Vale.—On the evening of March 1st, Carl D. Byrd, of Haviland, Kansas, closed a successful revival at Prairie Vale Meeting near Coldwater, Kansas. Thirty-three were definitely blessed either by renewal, conversion or the baptism with the Holy Spirit. At our last Monthly Meeting twenty-three united with the Church.

Friendswood, Texas.—Friendswood has been especially favored lately by visits from Louis E. Stout, of Wichita, Kansas, and Robert W. Douglass, the aged veteran of the cross, who stopped here on his way back from California. Both held meetings while here and their teaching has been profitable to us.

Northbranch, Kansas.—One of the most successful series of meetings held here in recent years has just closed. The meeting began the 24th of February and continued for twenty days closing March 15th. F. Olen Hunt, of Alba, Missouri, was the evangelist, while his sister, Miss Elsie Hunt, of Burr Oak, Kansas, rendered valuable help in song. The power of God was manifest from the first, and the ministry was peculiarly fitted to our needs. Differences of opinion on questions of local interest had divided the community and alienated many from the church services, but the gospel of love as it was faithfully presented proved to be the healing balm for all our ills. As visible results of the meetings there were 123 professions of definite blessing, either in the pardon of sin, the renewing of the covenant by some who were backslidden in heart, or in the sanctification of believers. At one service, when the call was made for those to come to an altar of prayer who felt any need in their lives, forty-three persons responded and professed definite blessing as their needs were met in Jesus Christ. We are especially grateful for the splendid work done among the students of the academy, there being only three who did not identify themselves on the side of Christ. Many were led to definitely consecrate their lives to the Master's service and testify to the baptism with the Holy Spirit. We are truly thankful to our Heavenly Father for sending his servants among us, and earnestly invoke God's blessing upon them in other fields of service for Him.

NEW ENGLAND YEARLY MEETING

Woonsocket, Rhode Island.—Not many years ago Smithfield Monthly Meeting was composed of three preparative meetings. It now consists of one meeting, that in Woonsocket. It is a small meeting averaging in attendance between thirty and forty. During the last year and a half it has lost, by death, six of its active members. Two were elders, one was the Clerk of the meeting, another was a doctor, and another a young lady, just twenty-one who had entered a hospital for training as a nurse. The present minister, William I. Kent, expects to return to his home in the West in the fall and he will be much missed. It is hoped that some of the active, stable young people will feel a responsibility laid upon them to be spokesmen for God in the meetings for worship. Their lives are sermons, but during the appointed hour for worship, there are some persons in the congregation who would be helped by the preached word.

NORTH CAROLINA YEARLY MEETING

Greensboro.—New Garden Quarterly Meeting was held at Greensboro, March 14th. The Meeting on Ministry and Oversight was engaged in routine work, hearing interesting reports from the five Monthly Meetings. At the 11:00 o'clock meeting, Aldelbert Wood preached with great acceptance from II. Cor. 13-9, on "Your Perfection." Luncheon was served at the noon hour. Reports from the Monthly Meetings showed fairly good work. The services of George N. Hartley of Fountain City, Indiana, in all the various meetings were noted with expressions of appreciation. The attention of the meeting was called to the "Militia Pay Bill," and a Committee was named to protest to the Senators and Representatives from North Carolina against the passage of this bill, the bill for the establishment of military training schools and similar measures.

OHIO YEARLY MEETING

Mt. Pleasant.—God has once more heard the cry of His children and poured out His Spirit on this place. Special meetings began Quarterly Meeting day, February 21st, and continued four weeks, closing Sabbath night, March 22d. We were favored with the presence of Daniel G. Hodgkin, whose ministry was in the power of the Spirit, also of Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Cosand, who had charge of the singing. The meetings were more largely attended than any held in Mt. Pleasant in recent years. More than a hundred souls were definitely blessed.

OREGON YEARLY MEETING

Star, Idaho.—Boise Valley Quarterly Meeting was held at Star, February 27 to March 1. The Meeting on Ministry and Oversight on Friday afternoon was a time of real blessing and power. That evening was given to temperance work, Mary L. Stanton giving the address. On Saturday morning, the Lord laid a burning message on the heart of Anson Cox, who emphasized the need of being Bible Christians, filled with the Spirit, and standing true to the Word of God. Luncheon was served at noon, after which the business of the meeting was transacted. The evening was devoted to Christian Endeavor work, each of the three Societies having a part on the program. Sabbath was a time of real blessing to those who remained.

Oliver Kenworthy, one of the pastors at Boise, Idaho, has been obliged to go to Portland, to a lower altitude, on account of his health. We trust he will soon be able to return. We are thankful that Isabel Kenworthy can stay and push the work for the salvation of souls and the building up of believers.

WESTERN YEARLY MEETING

Bloomingtondale.—A. Edward Kelsey, who is spending a few months in America, gave a very interesting talk on the mission work at Ram Allah, Palestine, at Bloomingtondale, on the evening of March 16th.

Twenty-four members were received by Bloomingtondale Monthly Meeting, held March 18th, as a result of the recent revival series, conducted by Robert A.

Pelt. Thirteen associate members requested to become active members.

Danville.—The meeting at Danville is in a very prosperous condition. The attendance is unusually good and the Sabbath School has outgrown the meeting house. The Christian Endeavor Society is two years old and has not asked once for a vacation. It has recently purchased a new piano and has also secured the Earlham College Glee Club for the 10th of April. Lindley A. Wells, of Portland, Oregon, will conduct a series of meetings for us, beginning the 26th instant, and the prospect is good for a very successful evangelistic campaign.

WILMINGTON YEARLY MEETING

Leesburg.—Friends of old Fairfield Meeting, Highland County, Ohio, have built a new commodious church house in the town of Leesburg, Ohio, at a cost of $12,000.00, which was dedicated February 8th, free of debt. Until the day of dedication there had been only $7,000.00 of the amount raised, but with the very efficient services of Thomas C. Brown, of Plainfield, Indiana, on the day of dedication, more than enough was raised to finish paying the entire amount. At the close of the day, after two specially favored services, T. C. Brown, in an earnest prayer on behalf of the Church, dedicated the new building to the service of God, and the memory of our worthy forefathers, who established a meeting and erected an altar to Jehovah about half a mile from the limits of the town of Leesburg, near the beginning of the nineteenth century. Since moving to town the attendance has more than doubled, both in the Sabbath School and Church service.

On March 1st revival services were commenced and with the very acceptable service of Ellison R. Purdy and wife, of Wilmington, continued nearly three weeks. The preaching throughout was with Divine authority and in the power of the Spirit, and the town of Leesburg and vicinity have been much blessed by the revelation of truth and its practical application to all the interests of life. The manifest results of the meeting were about twenty conversions and renewals and seventeen applications for membership with a prospect of more to follow. We look for an abundant harvest yet to come from the splendid seed sowing. Mrs. Purdy's ringing testimonies and her prayerful earnest spirit was a constant inspiration to the people.

J. Elwood Cox of High Point, North Carolina, has recently returned from a trip to the Panama Canal. He gave a fine address on the Canal at Guilford College.

PROPOSED CONFERENCE OF MEN

At the March session of Sandwich Monthly Meeting, held at West Falmouth, Massachusetts, the proposition of a Men's Conference to discuss the problems now facing the church, and to suggest plans for successful and aggressive work, was most heartily endorsed.

LOIS H. BOWERMAN,
Clerk for the day.

I would favor the proposed Conference of men Friends, and also a conference of women Friends. One could be held on the Atlantic Coast and the other on the Pacific Coast. I should prefer that the conference of women be in California. I hope great good may be the outcome of each if they are so held.

ANGELINE RICKETSON.

Pasadena, California.

Communications continue to be received concerning the proposed Conference of Men. The following will suffice as samples of those on hands:

Resolution passed by the Brotherhood of University Friends Meeting, Wichita, Kansas, March 12, 1914:

Resolved, That this Brotherhood favors the proposed meeting of men, but under the circumstances existing, it is our opinion that the sectional meetings are rather more feasible than the central meeting.

A. F. STYLES, President.

From this far away shore I have noted with interest intensified the discussions on the call for a gathering of Quaker Men. From the first, I said "Amen." Having had some evangelistic experience, I have often noted that definite results in reaching Men are much more readily obtained in Meetings for Men than in mixed audiences. It certainly would not be amiss for Quaker Men to get together on the important issues of the Church. One topic for discussion might be, "Does the Ministry of Women hold the place in Quakerism today it once held? If not, Why?"

EMMA F. COFFIN.

San Jose, California.

From the very first notice, I have been in hearty, cordial sympathy with the movement for a "Men's Conference"—with some limitations. The identical ones that had been on my mind, are given in better form than I could use by Luke Woodard and J. Edgar Williams in THE AMERICAN FRIEND of March. The burning vital question in the Friends Church is the Finances. A suggestion: Might it not be well to call for volunteers to attend a "Men's Conference" at their "own charges," thus ascertaining the real status of the case? If from three to five hundred sent in names, the Conference could go successfully forward.

THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

CORRESPONDENCE

VERMILION GROVE, ILL.,

March 11, 1914.

Editor of The American Friend:

Thank thee for the editorial, "Hungering after Righteousness." I trust that all young Friends everywhere will read it.

ONE OF THEM.

OAK PARK, ILL., March 16, 1914.

I want to tell thee in contradistinction to my former communications that thy editorials in the last two numbers of THE AMERICAN FRIEND are entirely in accord with my own ideas of the heart needs of mankind, and the clear-cut remedy for the blighting effect of sin, through faith in the crucified Son of God. I am so zealous for the Atonement, and all it brings to mankind through the blessed Holy Spirit.

M. H. RATCLIFF.

CHARLES H. AND H. ELIZABETH JONES

Charles H. Jones and his wife, H. Elizabeth Jones, have left to New England Yearly Meeting and to American Friends a legacy rich in the things which are eternal. In character, in service, and in devotion to the Kingdom of their Master they stood pre-eminent. Their consecration was not the kind which needed wordy declaration, but expressed itself in a loyalty to duty which recognized no distinction between the small task and the great undertaking. Their early life was spent in the interests of education among Friends of New England, and the atmosphere of this experience lingered with them as a sweet and encouraging influence for every young Friend whom they knew. Because of this Friends never realized that they were growing old until physical infirmity forced from their ever willing hands the many duties, responsibilities and offices of trust which their consecration had led them to accept.

As a home-maker and preacher, H. Elizabeth Jones will long be remembered for those qualities of disinterested love, patience and sweetness. Her message had the gentle persistent winning note which reached the heart by its very pleading. She was deeply interested in promoting social purity, and was for many years an active force in that department of the Yearly Meeting work. The note of Charles H. Jones' preaching was strong, virile, dominating, compelling. He was at one time Evangelistic Superintendent for New England Yearly Meeting, and then President of the Board of Evangelistic and Church Extension Work. Here his qualities of spiritual leadership rose to the surface. He was universally sought after and welcomed in every meeting. He fulfilled in a remarkable way that prophecy of the sacred writer when he said, "A man shall be as a hiding place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest, as streams of water in a dry place, as the shade of a great rock in a weary land."

When two lives have lived before the world as one in love, in service and in purpose for so long a time, it is not unfitting that as one and together they should begin their higher and heavenly service. So it was with these two. Within eight days Charles H. Jones followed his wife into the Great Presence. Their places are vacant, but all around them are rising up strong souls vitalized by their message, who today pray and humbly wait for a touch of their mantle, and a portion of their rich spirit.

CHARLES M. WOODMAN.

BIBLE SCHOOL LESSON

April 12.

Subject.—Journey to Emmaus. (Easter Lesson.)

Lesson.—Luke 24: 3-25.

Golden Text.—It is Jesus Christ that died, yea rather, that was raised from the dead. Rom. 8: 34.

Time.—Sunday afternoon, after the crucifixion.

Place.—The road to Emmaus from Jerusalem.

There is no more dramatic story in all the Bible than the story of this journey to Emmaus. The great tragedy of human history had been enacted two days before. Jesus had been taken, had been crucified, had been laid in the tomb. His disciples had been plunged into the depths of despair.

"But we hoped that it was he which should redeem Israel." They persisted in misunderstanding to the very last. It was the last sad wail of a supposedly lost cause.

The first day of a new week had come, and with it strange rumors, unbelievable ones. The tomb was empty, but as yet they could scarce believe the story of the angel that He whom they had seen crucified was now alive. In their perplexity two of the disciples were walking down to Emmaus, distress upon their countenances communing about the tragedy which had come into their lives.

They were joined by a stranger, to whom they open their hearts, and reveal the doubts and uncertainties which crowd their minds. Then it is that Jesus reveals Himself. No wonder that their hearts burned within them. Jesus was with them, and in their distress they did not recognize Him. How true to the experience of human life in all the ages! Jesus is ready today to reveal Himself to men as He did on that road to Emmaus, but so many turn away and will not be interested in His counsel.

Jesus proved His Messiahship by the Scriptures. Probably He began with the declaration in Eden, expounded the promise to Abraham, reminded them of the Exodus and the Shekinah, and interpreted the visions of the prophets. "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and light unto my path."

"And their eyes were opened." Then they knew Him, and a hope that had grown dim was kindled into new life. The resurrection of Jesus is the hope of the world. By it immortality is brought to light, and all the ages to come have proof of the Divinity of our Lord.

"The Lord is risen indeed." That was a glad Easter morning, and the disciples made haste to proclaim the glad news of a risen Christ. It is the vital element in the gospel message. It was glad news when the Messiah was born. It became glorious news when He triumphed over death and became alive forevermore. Well may we join with Henry Burton: "Have you found the heavenly light? Pass it on."

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR

April 12.

Topic.—A Long Look Ahead. I. Cor. 15: 35-58. (Easter Meeting.)

Paul here gives a vision of the final resurrection. It is not so much a lesson in theology as it is a practical lesson in preparation for the final reckoning.

The wise man prepares for the future. The thoughtful family lays by for a rainy day. Easter is a day to beget thoughts of heaven and immortality.

No man expects to miss heaven. At least he does not in his earlier life. Few men who live in a Christian civilization feel that death ends all. Jesus broke the bands of death and established for the ages the fact that there is a life beyond the tomb.

Eternity has no hope except in the Christian life. To the Christian this present life is but the beginning of endless joy. Sin has no future hope. Sin has only the power to destroy. It is the destruction of sin that creates the possibility of the "endless life."

Emphasis should be laid upon the fact that this is a life of preparation for the ages yet to come.

Try a few lines in the "Want" columns of THE AMERICAN FRIEND. They reach a wide constituency of the highest grade.

CLEVER WIFE

Knew How to Keep Peace in Family

It is quite significant, the number of persons who get well of alarming heart trouble when they let up on coffee and use Postum on the beverage at meals.

There is nothing surprising about it, however, because the harmful alkaloid—caffeine—in coffee is not present in Postum, which is made of clean, hard wheat.

"Two years ago I was having so much trouble with my heart," writes a lady in Washington, "that at times I felt quite alarmed. My husband took me to a specialist to have my heart examined.

"The doctor said he could find no organic trouble but said my heart was irritable from something I had been accustomed to, and asked me to try and remember what disagreed with me.

"I remembered that coffee had always soured on my stomach and caused me trouble from palpitation of the heart. So I stopped coffee and began to use Postum. I have had no further trouble since.

"A neighbor of ours, an old man, was so irritable from drinking coffee that his wife wanted him to drink Postum. This made him very angry, but his wife secured some Postum and made it carefully according to directions.

"He drank the Postum and did not know the difference, and is still using it to his lasting benefit. He tells his wife that the 'coffee' is better than it used to be, so she smiles with him and keeps peace in the family by serving Postum instead of coffee."

Name given by the Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum now comes in two forms: Regular Postum—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

AT MINNEAPOLIS

The subject of missions has recently claimed in an unusual way the attention and interest of Minneapolis Friends. Sunday, March 8th, our former pastor, Edward Kelsey, now Superintendent of Friends Mission Schools in Ram Allah, Palestine, spoke both at the morning service and at the C. E. meeting in the evening. The success of the Ram Allah girls' school and the outlook for the new boys' school, that is just being established, promise great things for Friends' mission work in the Holy Land. Although this mission is under the control and direction of New England Yearly Meeting, Minneapolis Friends shall always feel a keen personal interest in its welfare.

Following the Christian Endeavor Meeting, Mr. and Mrs. Keyes, African missionaries, gave an illustrated lecture on Methodist mission work in Portuguese East Africa. While one learns with great satisfaction of the splendid work of Christian missions, even in darkest Africa, he is made to realize at the same time the colossal work of civilizing and Christianizing that is yet to be done.

Neither is this work limited to the dark continent, nor even to the eastern hemisphere. When we speak of foreign missions, we naturally think of Africa, India, or China, perhaps overlooking the fact that some of our greatest mission problems and opportunities lie at our very feet. This was brought home to us in a most interesting and convincing way when, on the Thursday evening following the mission talks on Palestine and Africa, Evelyn Haworth addressed the Quakerism Study Class on "Friends Mission Work in Cuba." In few places could there be a greater need for Christian missions, and in few places, too, could results be more immediate and gratifying. The four Friends mission stations, Gibara, Holguin, Banes, and Puerto Padre, have led all other Friends missions in material growth, and are exerting a powerful educational and religious influence in eastern Cuba. These missions were established under the direction of Iowa Yearly Meeting.

A cordial welcome is extended to Friends coming to New York City and vicinity. Meeting houses, 144 East Twentieth Street, New York, and Lafayette and Washington Avenues, Brooklyn. Hour of worship, First-day, 11:00 a. m.

400,000 Settlers a Year

Immigration figures show that the population of Canada increased during 1913, by the addition of 400,000 new settlers from the United States and Europe. Most of these have gone on farms in provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Lord William Percy, an English Nobleman, says:

"The possibilities and opportunities offered by the Canadian West are so infinitely greater than those which exist in England, that it seems absurd to think that people should be impeded from coming to the country where they can most easily and certainly improve their position."

New districts are being opened up, which will make accessible a great number of homesteads in districts especially adapted to mixed farming and grain raising.

Christ Has Risen

BY EDWARD WING

He has risen, Christ has risen,
Worship Him ye host of heaven;
Sing, O earth, in glad acclaim
To the music of His name.
Gather not around His tomb,
Gather where the lilies bloom.

Let this day be bright with cheer,
Gladdest day of all the year;
Let the children shout and sing
Praises to their Savior King.
Hoary age and manhoods prime,
Lift your voice in notes sublime,
Gather not around His tomb;
Gather where the lilies bloom.

All our faith in the unknown
Out of this glad day has grown;
He has triumphed o'er the grave,
He arose with power to save,
Gather not around His tomb;
Gather where the lilies bloom.

O, the joy that we may know
Where our dearest loved ones go!
O, the name that lights the gloom
With the smile of love and home!
O, the faith that lifts our eyes
To a land beyond the skies!
We're not traveling to the tomb,
But where fairest lilies bloom.

Oh, glorious Easter morning!
Oh, day of peace and light;
One precious name adorning
With lilies pure and white;
A gladsome message bringing
Of love that knows no fear;
The sweetest anthem singing—
"The risen Christ is here."

Christ is risen! He is risen! He has left his rocky prison,
And the white-robed angels glimmer 'mid the cerements of his grave;
He has smitten with his thunder ev'ry gate of brass asunder;
He hath burst the iron fetters, irresistible to save!

Now We Tell the Story

Now we tell once more the story
How the wine press hath been trod;
Zion hath despised her glory;
Men have crucified their God!

Dark the day and sad the morrow
Of redemption finished thus;
Fain would we with holy sorrow
Mourn for Him who died for us.

Roman soldiers keep their station
Watching where His form is laid;
Zion's King, the world's salvation,
Sleepeth now in death's cold shade;

But the Sabbath now is waning,
And the first Lord's day is nigh;
Christ, o'er Death as Victor reigning,
Soon shall bid all sadness fly.

So each year is told the story
Of the story and the joy
Till as Judge He comes in glory,
And His arm shall Death destroy.

The Great Easter Thought

BY E. F. WIEST, D.D.

It is immortality. Christ's coming back from the spirit world and revealing Himself to many credible witnesses was God's answer to the agelong guess, hope, longing. The guess, the hope, the longing for an assurance of lasting existence has been realized. Who can describe the consolation that has come to the children of men when they have seen the earth swallow up the mortal part of their beloved by the words, "I am the resurrection and the life?" Who can tell us how much the resurrection has done by way of inspiring men to noble living?

The resurrection of Jesus has changed the attitude of man toward death and what is beyond. He lives. He has given assurance that where He is all those shall be who live and die in Him. To be where He is! Ah, that is heaven enough for anyone. Jesus showed that death is not the extinguisher of life, but part of the way to triumph and glory.

We do not speak of our departed friends as of those who "were" or "have been." No, we speak of those who are in better worlds. The range of death is but narrow and but momentary in duration. Death makes the entrance into fuller, perfect life possible. If it were not so, God would never permit death. He has a better sphere in store for us. This earth is a place for temporary sojourn; there is another sphere in which is the permanent home. Death is necessary only that we may pass from this temporal life into the eternal glory.—Ex.

Alive for Evermore

The resurrection of Jesus Christ is not a culmination but an introduction. It is not the climax of Christ's career; it is the opening of a new epoch in his continuous ministry among men. Wonderful in cumulative strength are the demonstrations of his triumph over death which our Lord made. His emergence from the tomb convinced multitudes of contemporary skeptics. Forty days he continued in cheerful intercourse with the disciples and friends, giving, as Luke says, "many infallible proofs," after which he ascended to the Majesty on high in the presence of witnesses who have told us the story with surprising simplicity, but with sufficient detail. Ten days later, in accord with his explicit promise, the Holy Spirit, swept down upon the assembled disciples with marvelous power, and the physical miracle of the burning tongues was quickly translated into the spiritual marvel of transformed characters and overthrown kingdoms. Speedily came the conversion of the Apostle Paul, an event of almost immeasurable significance, since it was accomplished in the face of his resolute purpose to exterminate Christianity and was entirely due to the overpowering conviction in his soul that the Jesus whom he had sought to persecute was the Lord of Glory. To this great-brained man, in some manner unexplained, Jesus Christ appeared, leaving him with an unshakable belief that the crucified one was none other than the Son of God.—Ex.

"He Is Not Here, But Is Risen"

To the apostles, the resurrection of Jesus was the most glorious fact they had ever known. To them it meant the stamp of approval upon all that Jesus had said and done and the assurance of faith in Him as the Savior of the world. With all the earnestness of men who had caught a vision of a new day for the world, they set about the task of making the world see and comprehend the same glorious vision.

Without the resurrection, the Christian world would probably still be bowing down to images of wood and of stone. It is the story of the empty tomb that has convinced the world of the truth of the gospel of the risen Christ. Without its memory, hope would grow dull and faith would die out in many a soul. It is no wonder that the apostles literally "turned the world upside down" as they went about proclaiming the resurrection story.

Why should Paul face shipwreck and encounter perils by land and by sea? Why should he fight with the wild beasts at Ephesus? Why should he submit to prison bars? There is only one answer. He had seen his risen Lord on his way to Damascus. Why should the martyrs face the fagots and the jibbet with a smile upon their faces? They by faith had seen the risen Christ, and knew that beyond the tomb there was the assurance of a glorious immortality. Why should men and women today leave home and country for the unknown dangers of heathen and even savage lands, to tell once again the story of human redemption? They too have seen the risen Lord, triumphant over death, alive forever more.

Friends are not accustomed to observing the times and the seasons. Outward ritualism has been discarded for the essence of truth. Yet the memory of Jesus' birth, His ministry, His crucifixion, His resurrection come to us as holy benedictions, and at the recurrence of the spring time year by year, our faith grows stronger as we contemplate the glorious life we have, and all the ages will have, in the risen Redeemer.

The resurrection brought to the world the day-break of a new morning. Because of it Paul could count all things but loss. Because of it we may rise into newness of life with the Savior. The doctrine of the resurrection accords with all the fundamental principles of the gospel. The fact that men today are being rescued from spiritual death is additional proof that Jesus is yet alive, with the same life-giving power at His command as He possessed on that first Easter day.

"O grave, where is thy victory?
O death, where is thy sting?
The stone, the seal, alike are vain,
The Royal Captive breaks his chain.
Upraise the halleluia-strain
To our all-conquering King!"

Shall We Have a Conference of Men?

For some weeks we have purposely avoided editorial discussion of the proposed conference of men of our denomination. We have preferred that the membership have opportunity to consider the question without prejudice or without undue pressure from any quarter. While the suggestion of such a conference originated in these columns, we have no purpose to press its claims, unless it appeals to the best judgment of our members.

The volume of correspondence upon the subject which has reached this office is taken as evidence that the proposition has struck a responsive chord both east and west, and that a considerable portion of the church is really thinking about it. This is our sole justification for further consideration in the editorial columns of THE AMERICAN FRIEND.

What little opposition there has been has centered chiefly about the fact that women are not included in the proposed conference, and the claim that the expenditure to the church will be too great. If the conference be a luxury and not important or essential to the life of the church at this time, the latter objection is well founded. If its importance can be substantiated, and if the church really needs the inspiration of such a gathering, no expense within reason is too great. There is apparently a growing belief that unless the manhood of the church can be stirred to a mighty activity in the near future, the church as a whole is slated to go backward. It may seem disloyalty to admit this or even suggest it, but the church cannot afford to refuse to consider the strong probability of it for a mere question of expense.

So far as the question of the non-participation of women is concerned, the church can never afford to get in bondage to any custom. They who insist that the equality of the sexes is a governing principle of our denominational life, must take care that they do not strain its application to a point that will cast discredit upon the worth of the principle. If the men of the Society of Friends need as men to feel the tug of a great call that can only be voiced at the council chambers of our Quaker manhood, we are sure that the sober second thought of our women will not permit them to padlock the door of opportunity against the possibility of such an achievement. This proposition involves no problems of executive or legislative polity, wherein both men and women are yoked together in a common cause. It is rather a question of getting our men to see that there are denominational problems that are worth while, that call for the application of their best endeavors, that will enable them to get a vision of the great need of consecrated service in the face of the mighty tasks to which God is calling His Church.

Friends have exacted no service of their men as men, while they have opened the door wide for their women to band themselves together as women in ladies' aid societies, in support of missions, and, in some of the Yearly Meetings, in social fellowship groups. The result has been that all too meager a percent. of our men have interested themselves in any constructive, leading way in behalf of our problems which are pressing for settlement. In many meetings the women outnumber the men, two to one, at the Sabbath service for worship, while in the majority of our meetings, far too many of our strong, virile men, young as well as old, never present themselves at a business session.

If the roll were called of the strong young men who have been lost to Friends within the past twenty-five years and who are in grave danger of being lost today, through their inability to feel that a man's job awaits them if they remain, we would have presented a rather startling picture of a condition which the church thus far has refused to face seriously. Our women have heard the sad wail of their heathen sisters across the seas, and have seen the heart of motherhood bleeding and torn because of sin in our own land, and they have banded themselves together as women to render whatever assistance they may. But as yet no appeal to touch the heart of the manhood of the world has gripped the men of our church in any tangible, constructive, impelling way.

We have heard much about the suffering of womanhood and degradation of childhood in the heathen world, and, God pity them, they need all the succor which the redemptive power of the Atonement and the uplift of a Christian civilization can bring them; but the dark picture of the world's manhood groping in sin, impelled by selfish, un-Godly motives in the performance of commercial, social and governmental functions has as yet, failed to stir our Christian men in any manner adequate to the task which the existence of these conditions imposes.

As a denomination, we have hardly kept pace with the awakening that is coming to the Christian Church throughout the world. It is largely a question of seeing visions of responsibility and opportunity and of the inspiration which such visions are sure to bring. If by any process our Quaker men can be made to see the work which is waiting to be done, and can be inspired with a yearning of soul to have a part in its accomplishment, both the denomination and those who come within the circle of its influence will feel the inspiration of a new life for many years to come.

Criticism is often cheap, and God forbid that we should criticise, except to help! He is no friend who sees danger and does not warn of its existence; who sees a wasting of energies and makes no effort to seek its cause. We are not blind to the splendid qualities of the life and mission of the Society of Friends in America when we voice the conviction that denominationally we are in a rut. Otherwise, it would not be such a difficult task to stir the whole church to action. Our Quaker life is far too provincial. Too often we fail to see beyond the boundaries of our local membership, or at most of our Yearly Meeting. We lack denominational spirit; we lack a constructive, unified purpose; we lack cohesive organism; we lack a responsibility that will solidify practically the entire membership back of a few well organized constructive lines of work, and we lack the aggressiveness that will make our church a progressive, evangelistic force in every community where we have meetings, and in scores of communities where Friends ought to have a foothold.

Of course every problem is subordinate to the overshadowing need of a life, collective and individual, dedicated to do the will of the Father, but in so far as we have problems that call for our serious attention, they seem to us to center about our financial situation, our internal organism, and our relations to other bodies and to the great tasks which the Church should face in every community and in the world at large.

Yet, after all, the value of a conference lies not so much in the light that is thrown upon detailed methods, as in the vision which comes to minds trying earnestly to see the same things, and the inspiration which takes possession of those who are brought face to face with great opportunities to render large service in the uplift and betterment of humanity. The men of the Society of Friends need such inspiration as that; they need a vision of community work and of world work that will start every fiber of their being pulsating with a purpose to have a man's part in bringing the Kingdom of God into the community life; into the world of commerce and trade; into the ranks of statesmanship, no less than into the life of the manhood of the heathen world.

If there can be a conference that will produce results like these, even in any appreciable degree, who is there to say nay to the proposition? The destiny of the Society of Friends in America will wait in large degree upon the answer which the church is going to give to this question.

Great Educational Program Proposed

BY H. D. WILLIAMS

On the evening of March 9th more than one hundred Friends assembled as the guests of Whittier College at Hotel Hayward in Los Angeles, where they enjoyed a social hour and a banquet, followed by a program and discussion bearing on questions vital to the future of the Friends' Church in America. The occasion proved to be of surpassing interest to all present.

Dr. W. V. Coffin, president of the college board, in opening referred to the startling achievements and great religious activities that mark the opening years of the twentieth century, prominent among these being the Laymen's Missionary Movement, the Men and Religion Forward Movement, the Federation of American Churches, and the recent great Student Volunteer Convention, with 5,000 delegates representing 800 colleges and universities, indicating that a rising tide of missionary and evangelistic interest sways the educational forces of America.

Dr. Coffin spoke of the efforts of individual denominations to find their proper share in these great movements, and to adopt methods that shall make for greater efficiency and fruitfulness. He closed with the question: What of the Friends' Church in America; has it awakened to its opportunity, and is it making an adequate contribution to this generation?

Dr. J. J. Mills, General Secretary of the Five Years Meeting of American Friends, spoke next on "The Present Status of American Quakerism." He spoke of the splendid heritage bequeathed to the church and the world by George Fox in his interpretations of the gospel, a prominent feature of which was his discovery of the individual man, and his worth and importance as having access to God through Jesus Christ, the Mediator of the new covenant. This vital truth and distinctive feature of Quakerism has gradually permeated the thought of the religious world, and is today shaping its activities in an increasing degree. This estimate of the individual man early led Friends to promote prison reform, and to oppose slavery and war, because the individual man must not be made the prey of his fellows, with whom he stands equal before God. Under the widening acceptance of the priesthood of believers, and personal communion of the individual with God, types and shadows have become scarcely more than nominal features in Protestant creeds, and the Quaker thought on this line, still steadfastly maintained by our church, is largely that of the religious world today. Dr. Mills, enlarging on this line with his wonted force and clearness, certainly gave to his attentive hearers a widening vision of the mission of the Friends' Church, and the opportunities that lie before her.

President Thomas Newlin then reviewed briefly the educational status in the United States and the educational interests of Friends in America. He showed what a standard college is according to the standards set by the Carnegie Foundation, and also what a great change had taken place in college standards and college life in the last generation, but he also showed that most Friends' colleges have kept pace with the advancing standard. Only three Friends' colleges are strictly collegiate,—Haverford, Earlham and Whittier,—all the other six colleges have preparatory departments. In the number of collegiate students, Whittier stands fifth among Friends' colleges. Whittier College is organized under twelve departments, carrying more than 130 courses in the four years. This work is all done by a faculty of trained and devoted teachers that receive in the aggregate no more than the presidents of some of our state universities.

The speaker showed that certain things stand out in the history of Christian education in America. Among these are:

1. There should be in every denomination a strong supervising board backed by enthusiasm and financial support.
2. There should be the fullest co-operation within each denomination and comity with other bodies. Every denomination should ask itself two questions: How can we greatly increase our efficiency? How can we greatly increase our unity?
3. There is a crying need of a campaign of education. This is our greatest need.
4. New and larger buildings will not avail unless we place the emphasis where it belongs, namely on the faculty.

The ideal of Whittier College is the formation of Christian character, and seeks for its students the highest equipment for service to the church and to the world, and the thoroughness of its Teacher Training work, its Biblical Department and its Christian Associations emphasizes this central purpose.

The whole spirit and trend of the meeting was much wider than the interests of Whittier College. May we not hope that this may prove the beginning of a movement that shall bring our yearly meetings and colleges into better working relations, and closer co-ordination in furthering their missionary and educational interests; a movement that shall bring these interests under a central authority? This central board could establish standards and inaugurate methods throughout our church and educational work which will invite financial investments in their support by assuring efficiency and permanency.

This is in harmony with the wider work of the Council of the Church Boards of Education, of which President Robert L. Kelly is a member, and agreeable to suggestions made by him in a recent issue of THE AMERICAN FRIEND. The important action referred to by this meeting of the friends of Whittier College, was the introduction by Absalom Rosenberger, President Emeritus of Penn College, of the following resolutions and their unanimous adoption. Hon. A. F. N. Hambleton also introduced a resolution pledging to Whittier College the hearty support in its effort to add $75,000 to its endowment, and to raise $25,000 for a Library Building.

RESOLUTIONS

In view of the larger vision that is coming to the Friends as to their proper place in the great world movements and as to their responsibility in co-operating with the other branches of the Christian Church in their efforts to advance the cause of the Redeemer's kingdom on the earth: Be it resolved, That we favor submitting to the Friends in America the following propositions:

1.

That the time has fully come for the church by a united effort to endeavor to secure large funds for the purpose of carrying on its departmental work as outlined by the Uniform Discipline of the Five Years Meeting.

2.

That an Education Secretary should be appointed who shall devote all his time to the cause of education among Friends and be under the advice and direction of the Board of Education of the Five Years Meeting.

3.

That the General Secretary of the Five Years Meeting, the Secretary of Education and the Secretary of the American Board of Missions should jointly institute a campaign for raising two million dollars, one half of which shall be turned over to the Board of Education for the better endowment of Friends colleges and the other half to the Board for Home and Foreign Missions.

4.

That, since the future of Christian colleges depends upon their ability to attract, hold and equip both intellectually and spiritually all classes of their youth for the highest service in church and state, the Board of Education should make this fact prominent in its educational policy, and require the colleges to maintain high educational standards, employ faculties of recognized intellectual ability and lay especial emphasis upon noblest Christian ideals.

5.

That each college shall maintain a strong department of Biblical Literature which shall be equal in standing and requirements to the other departments of the college, giving such instruction as will better equip ministers of the gospel, Bible School teachers and other members for Christian work, in order that these may offer more efficient service to the church.

6.

That ministers of the gospel, pastors, Bible School superintendents and other prominent Friends should be diligent in helping direct our youth into Friends' colleges and in urging upon them the importance of thorough educational preparation as an essential to the highest efficiency in service for the Master.

A Monthly Meeting Chronicle

(Wherein is told the story of a Monthly Meeting which caught a vision, and with some misgivings decided to improve an opportunity.)

BY JUNIUS JUNIOR

XIII.

A new year had come to the world, a year that marked the anniversary of the rebirth of Slow Valley Monthly Meeting. It was little wonder that early in the first session of the new year, the congregation broke forth into song:

Praise God from whom all blessings flow,
Praise Him all creatures here below;
Praise Him above, ye heavenly host,
Praise Father, Son and Holy Ghost.

The spirit of revival which had swept through every home in the meeting and throughout the community, was still in every heart. The attendance was record breaking for a business session, and while they tarried in the devotional service, one after the other expressed their gratitude to God not only for personal blessings but for the outpouring of the Spirit which had come upon the meeting and the entire neighborhood.

"It just seems to me I'll never get through praising God for the great change which has come to Slow Valley Meeting," said one of the leading women. "Here we were a year ago all in the dumps, thinking we could do nothing and ready almost to yield to discouragement, but by the application of a little consecrated common sense, which started us out to do something and to show the neighborhood that we were really interested in the spiritual welfare of everybody around us, God has literally showered His blessings upon us, and has given us an abundance of souls for our hire."

"It all came about when we were ready to forget ourselves and began to think about our neighbors in the community," said another. Even the retired farmer shared in the general rejoicing, and said that "no one is gladder than I am at the general evidences of religious prosperity in our midst."

"What God has done for us, He can do for anybody else," was the comment of the young school teacher, who voiced the unanimous sentiment of the young people when he said, "We feel that we owe the best of our lives first to our Heavenly Father and then to our meeting which has demonstrated a sincere desire to lend a helping hand wherever it is needed. We feel that there is no sacrifice too great for us to make in support of whatever the meeting undertakes in Christ's name."

The resident minister preached a sermon that was the talk of the town for days, so deeply did it touch every heart. It concerned the parable of the sower and was an earnest appeal for the cultivation of the "good ground" for a bounteous harvest of soul winning and the building of Christian character.

In the business session, every report had a hopeful tone that was in strong contrast with the reports of a year ago. The Bible School had increased its attendance and on the previous Sabbath had reached high water mark with a total of 212 present. The foreign mission report showed a net increase in contributions for the year of $78.49, the increase being most marked during the past two months. The Finance Committee reported that during the previous week the last deficit had been paid, except a small balance of $46.00 on the building fund and that as a result of the every-member canvass, imperfect as it was, the financial outlook was most encouraging.

The report on the state of the church was emphatic in the belief that never had the meeting been in such good condition, and remarked especially upon the good work being done by the young people. The Evangelistic Committee reported a total of 147 conversions at the recent revival and said that arrangements were made for a service of worship every two weeks at the Bennett school house, following the Sabbath School which now had an enrollment of seventy-eight.

A letter was read from residents of the Turkey Hollow neighborhood, six miles to the northeast, expressing the feeling that a Sabbath School was needed in that community. After discussion this was referred to the Bible School Committee with power to act. The C. E. Committee had an optimistic report, and recited the fact that two of the young ladies had gotten together a class of fourteen neglected children to whom they were teaching Bible lessons in connection with simple sewing, on Saturday afternoons in the new primary room of the meeting house.

The Pastoral Committee reported that arrangements had been made for a new pastor, one of the strong men of the denomination, a true leader, a college graduate with the love of God in his soul and a passion for pushing the work of the Lord zealously and with effectiveness. He would not be able to come until the first of February, and meanwhile the resident minister with others in the congregation could be relied upon for public service both at Newtown and at the Bennett school house. It was a matter of congratulation that the young school teacher and one of the young women active in the C. E. Society were developing the ministerial gift as frequent opportunities for its exercise were offered both in the meeting and in the neighborhood.

As unfinished business the meeting took up the proposition for two general committees with sub-departments, one to have general charge of the work the meeting was doing for itself, the other to look after the work which the meeting was to do for others, according to the plan outlined at the December meeting. It was still evident that the power of custom had a strong hold upon some of the members, who were loth to give up the old plan of separate committees. So strongly, however, were the claims of the new proposition urged by its advocates, both from the standpoint of efficiency and of economy, that the meeting finally decided to try the experiment, subject to such limitations as were necessarily imposed by the Yearly Meeting system and that of the Five Years Meeting.

"We are wasting a tremendous amount of energy," said the farmer during the discussion. "We find that certain committees are continually overlapping in their work, with the result that frequently the work is not done at all because some committee has come to expect some other one to do it. Then again we have seen over and over that certain members of committees have only a nominal interest in the work assigned to them and need the impetus and re-enforcement of a central committee, some one member of which is expected to have a special interest in a particular department under its care. By this method we will save duplication largely, we will save unnecessary expense, we will make more sure of the work being done. Instead of the work being divided among a lot of committees more or less irresponsible, the responsibility of the whole plan of service will center in two committees, which by their general oversight, will not only insure the performance of the service, but will see that it is done efficiently and economically."

To some the arguments of the farmer seemed theoretical; to others, who understood human nature a little better, they seemed intensely practical, and it was agreed to appoint a nominating committee to bring forward names in February to constitute the two central committees. The question of the appointment of the sub-committees representing the departments caused some discussion, but finally this was left to the central committees when named, as they were to be made responsible for the work to be done, although some felt that this savored too much of the centralization of power.

The overseers reported forty-nine applications for membership, which caused the congregation to break forth again with the doxology after which the customary committees on visitation were appointed. An appeal for the aid of charity in the city was made, and a collection brought in the sum of $34.37 for this purpose and two Friends were named to solicit additional amounts during the coming week. The committee on work among the foreigners reported progress, although the problem was a complex one, which had not yet been worked out satisfactorily.

Announcement was made that on the following Wednesday the churches of the city would hold an all-day session in the interest of the United Mission Campaign, and that one week later, Slow Valley Meeting would have a denominational conference of its own on the question. The concluding minute was read, and the members dispersed conscious of the fact that they had held one of the most important meetings in the history of the congregation.

"He Surrendered Himself"

BY ALBERT J. BROWN

We were on a night train whose destination was Indianapolis. There were few passengers, most of whom were commercial traveling men. I was attracted toward two men whose conversation was interesting and intelligent. In the course of time the usual question came up—What is your line? On stating my business, one of the two gentlemen put out his hand and said:

"Your company has a great salesman in this territory. A friend joined me, one morning of the Convention, in a curiosity stroll through the great Exhibit Hall. We became conscious of a young man's attractive manner and pleasing facial invitation to come his way. We went his way. Presently we passed on, but not alone. The young man's product was with us. Its claims, its merits, its structure, its principle were living things with us. That young man sold us then and there, but, singularly enough, I have no distinct recollection of him. My friend could not recall any striking feature or characteristic of him when next we met. In fact, he said the young man did not possess personality.

"But, we are salesmen and felt we must analyze the sales method employed. We concluded, and we think wisely, that the young man possesses great personality, and that the secret of his power was his self-surrender that his product might live in vividness and commanding desire."

The lights of the city were in view. The streets were deserted for it was midnight. The speed of the train perceptibly slackened; the air brakes were set; the car trembled, lurched slightly and was still. I was on the quiet street, but not alone. The commercial traveler's story was with me. I thought of our church. Its great past, its heralds of the Gospel who lost sight of self that the institution might live. When sleep came to my eyes I was meditating on those thrilling words: "The children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light."

Southland College, Arkansas

Readers of THE AMERICAN FRIEND are aware of the fact that Indiana Yearly Meeting has in its care a school of Academic and Industrial training for the Negro, located near Helena, Kansas. We are asking space, therefore, in our paper for a short account of our late visit to the college.

Leaving Richmond, Indiana, on Friday morning, March 19th, by continuous travel we reached Lexa, Phillips County, Arkansas, at 10 a. m. the following day. We were met at the railroad station by H. C. Wolford, President of the school, and a farmer ready to escort us to the college, three miles away, in their open spring wagon. Reaching the college we were heartily greeted by Mrs. Wolford, matron, and the corps of teachers from the north, who were looking for our coming.

After a short rest the dinner bell sounded and was as welcome to our ears as to the ears of the 160 who listen for its music three times a day. This being Saturday there was no school, but the boys and girls, assigned to their different duties, were all busily engaged in their regular appointed work for the day. It afforded us much satisfaction to see how heartily they entered into their work and how expeditiously it was accomplished.

We were informed that this was Southland Monthly Meeting day and gladly accepted the invitation to attend. President H. C. Wolford presided and thirty-four persons were present. The meeting was opened by singing, after which Mrs. Wolford read from the New Testament the story of Jesus' interview with the Syro-phenician woman, making some very wholesome and appropriate comments. Prayer was offered by Mrs. Busby, in which she gratefully acknowledged the benefit that had come to their family through the care and religious influence that their children had received in this institution.

Many took part during the devotional period, and the time of silence was very solemn. At the proper time the recording clerk was called to the desk, and the business was conducted quite like our northern Monthly Meetings in good order and unity. The one peculiar thing was that a collection was taken at the close of the meeting.

We spent the balance of the afternoon looking over the campus and the buildings. We found all in good shape, indeed, much better than we had anticipated. Some of the buildings have been erected since our last visit five years ago. We mention especially the boys' dormitory, which was made possible by the gift of Luzena Thornburg, a friend of the institution; the carpenter shop, a gift from the President and Matron, and the new laundry, replacing the one destroyed by fire.

At ten o'clock Sunday morning we attended the Bible School. 239 persons were present. The opening hymn was well rendered. Prayer was offered by the Superintendent, after which the classes adjourned to their respective recitation rooms. Although the classes were large all appeared attentive to the instruction given.

After a short recess the morning meeting assembled in the Chapel, about 300 being present and the President presiding. Following the Scripture reading, prayer was offered by several members of the Church, after which a choice selection of music was rendered by some young girls about sixteen. The sermon was given by Herschel Folger, principal of the school and a minister in the Friends Church. His subject was "Growth," and he handled it well for his audience, showing that there is a possibility of two kinds of growth, viz.: growth upward or growth downward.

At three o'clock the Y. P. S. C. E. gathered in the Chapel under their own management. Ninety were present. This meeting was opened by song service. The Phoenix Band had special music for the occasion. Very many of the pupils took part in the service, either by comment or the reading of Scripture passages pertinent to the topic of the day. It was not only an interesting but a profitable meeting. The Sabbath evening services are conducted separately, the boys in their dormitory, under the direction of the Governor, and the girls in their dormitory in charge of the Governess. We devoted Monday and Tuesday to visiting different departments of the school, and found most of them in very satisfactory condition, always bearing in mind the difficulty of getting the best of teachers for every department.

Write Your Congressman in Behalf of National Prohibition.

Hearings are to be had at Washington in behalf of the Sheppard-Hobson resolutions for National Prohibition, before the House Judiciary Committee on April 15th, and before a sub-judiciary committee of the Senate on April 16th. All Friends are asked to write letters at once to their U. S. Senators and their member of the House, urging speedy and favorable action upon the resolutions. Letters should be written also to Senator W. E. Chilton, Chairman of the Senate Sub-Committee, and Hon. Henry D. Clayton, Chairman of the House Judiciary Committee. Now is the time for the voice of the Nation to be heard.

We were especially pleased with what we saw of the vocational training, more recently introduced into the school. In the carpenter shop we found Russell Brown teaching the lads how to make gates and other things that his pupils will need to know how best to do in their after life. They were engaged on a model of house building, such a one as they might need for themselves after while. The shop has ten benches. They could use four more if there were room. The boys are very anxious to get into this class. The domestic science department was equally attractive to the girls. We saw them as they went over their lesson of how to prepare and cook some articles of food properly. We realized as never before the great benefit this vocational training will be to these students, coupled with the good academic, highly moral and advanced spiritual teaching they are getting at Southland College. About 5 p.m. Tuesday, Mr. Woodin and wife arrived at the college in their automobile to inspect the electric light plant which he had installed on the college grounds and which was to be put into operation that evening. The engine was first started to run part of the 125 lamps and under the pleasant and safer light the student body and faculty partook of the evening meal. Just before the students entered their dining hall, Mrs. Woodin, who had never before been at the college, was taken into this room with eighteen tables, each seating eight persons and the room lighted with electricity. To her it was a vision of what Northern Friends are doing for the Negro, and it will have its influence for good.

We have written this in the hope that Friends in Indiana Yearly Meeting may become more practically interested in the work that is being done at Southland. There will be opening for two teachers from the North, possibly more, for the coming school year. The President and Matron are looking forward to making a change as soon as suitable persons can be secured to take their places.

Shall be pleased to answer any inquiries.

EDWARD BELLIS, Cor. Secretary.

Easter

BY JOHN KENDALL

Memorial of death and Life,
It bids the world to cease its strife,
Renew its hopes, forget its grief,
And trust in Him most Righteous Chief.

A Resurrection from death's decay,
Evidence of a heavenly way,
Without it, all would be in vain,
For to live is Christ, to die is gain.

All hopes adrift on stormy sea,
Nothing afloat to which to flee,
All anchors hold in trouble's storm,
Since the miracle, Christ performed.

Except the grain die, there's no reproduction,
By Grace through Faith, there is salvation,
Unless a man die to self and to sin,
There's a resurrection of damnation for him.

A lasting monument—Life from the grave,
A rebuke to the wicked and sinful slaves,
Who would sleep on duty, with lies,
To cast a doubt on the Savior to rise.

A birth, a death is the order of things,
The Savior fulfilled it, knowing no sins, Triumphed o'er his enemies, death and the grave,
And proclaimed to the world, come and be saved.

The flower—the essence of nature revived,
The egg—the emblem of all that's alive,
The Savior—a Savior of all that are dead,
But repent—turn about and in His path tread.

The full orb'd moon—some darkness dispelled,

In the fullness of time, the True Light's beheld,

Who lived, worked, died and arose
again,

And goes beyond the cloud, out of the view of men.

Current Items of Interest to Friends

BALTIMORE YEARLY MEETING

Baltimore.—Baltimore Quarterly Meeting was held on the 28th and 29th ultimo with about the usual attendance. In the meeting on Ministry and Oversight a discussion, arising from the appointment of elders, as to the relation of these officials to the life and activities of the meetings, was very helpful. A digest of this discussion was formulated by the clerk and directed to be sent to the local meetings. The meetings for worship were helpful. The evening meeting on Saturday was devoted to an address by Rayner W. Kelsey, Professor of History in Haverford College, on "Some Lessons from Our Past." The speaker logically showed why the Friends about the year 1700 passed into a "dead level period," during which the life of the Society was absorbed in the effort to keep to the letter of the ancient testimonies. They built their walls wide and high to shut out the world and from their fear of a "hireling ministry" left no room for the service of well equipped and efficient men who could respond adequately to the call of a spiritual impulse. Consequently when the walls of exclusiveness were forcibly broken from the outside we discarded not only many needless formalities, but some of our most valuable possessions, chief among which was our distinctive type of meeting for worship. There is a need today for the constructive leadership of adequately trained and compensated workers who value and seek to conserve this type of meeting, having a clear conception of the fundamentals of religion upon which it rests. The address aroused much interest. On Sunday evening A. Edward Kelsey gave an account of the Ram Allah Mission in Palestine and of his work there. The sessions were all profitable and inspiring.

CALIFORNIA YEARLY MEETING

Lindsay.—Evangelist E. P. Loose, of Waukesha, Wisconsin, and Prof. A. C. Willgus, of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, conducted a month's evangelistic campaign here during February. The meetings were a great power in the community, and all moral and Christian forces are greatly strengthened and encouraged. Four churches united in the campaign, the Friends' being one of them. About five hundred confessed Jesus Christ as Savior, and many others were led to send for church letters and identify themselves with churches here. As direct and indirect results of the campaign the Friends' Church received about forty new members, about one-half being children. A few others will yet be received as soon as their church letters arrive. The Lindsay Church was organized July, 1912. In May, 1913, they dedicated their new church building. The membership had reached sixty-five before the Loose campaign. With this large increase (amounting to sixty-five percent.) the work takes on new life and vigor. The morning attendance runs about ninety and the Sunday School about seventy to seventy-five.

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING

West Branch, Marion Quarter.—West Branch Church had a two weeks' meeting in February that resulted in great good to the meeting and to the community. The entire monthly meeting was stirred as never before. Aaron Napier, pastor of Amboy meeting, was the evangelist and the gospel was presented in such a plain way and with such love and tenderness, that people were made hungry for Godliness, and a great number sought and found a satisfying Savior. The meeting was held during the very worst weather of the winter, but that did not interfere with the meeting in the least. The church was filled every night from the first, and the last four or five nights many that came were unable to get inside at all. Aaron Napier held a two weeks' meeting here last spring, and the work done then was so thorough that everyone that was converted stood true and was ready for service this year when the meeting began. One week after the revival closed the evangelist returned and preached on "What Friends Believe and Why They Believe It." The message was so convincing that many applied for membership with Friends. The day following this meeting, Aaron Napier attended Monthly Meeting at Maple Run, and brought a message that was so filled with love and tenderness that there was a real melting time before the Lord. This Monthly Meeting was more largely attended than any one in years.

West Elkton, Ohio.—Nettie Springer and Effie Minehart came to us the middle of February and held a two weeks' meeting. Their ministry and song were well received. The very inclement weather throughout the meeting, and the heavy drifted snow, made the country roads impassable for a few days. Yet the attendance of the townspeople was good most of the time. Much interest was manifested in the meetings, and we believe the church was helped and good accomplished, though not what we had hoped, or perhaps what would have been had conditions been more favorable. We can heartily recommend the efficiency of both these workers.

Lynn.—Lindley A. Wells, of Portland, Oregon, began a series of evangelistic meetings at Lynn, March 5th. Twenty-eight sessions were held, closing March 22d. From the very beginning a deep interest was manifest and the attendance was large. The three Bible School services during the series numbered respectively 305, 340, 310, with over 500 in one evening service. Lindley Wells' ministry was one of scriptural teaching and not sensational. He preaches the old established doctrines of repentance, conversion, and the baptism with the Holy Spirit, clearly and scripturally. His methods of work and appeal are sane and without excitement. About fifty-five persons were definitely blessed either in conversion, renewal, or sanctification. But arithmetic can not measure evangelistic efforts and much more was done than the above figures show.

On Sabbath morning, March 29th, at the call of the pastor, twenty-three, all adults but two, came forward and united with the church, receiving an impressive welcome from the pastor, the chairman of the pastoral committee, and the congregation. We are very grateful for the services of Lindley Wells and for the outpouring of God's blessing upon us.

Little Ridge.—Little Ridge Friends' Church, four miles south-west of Fairmount, Indiana, is one of the best, if not the best, examples of a live rural church to be found among Friends, and probably is not surpassed by a congregation of any other denomination. They have a successful Bible school of which Mrs. Denny Winslow is the Superintendent. Two adult classes, with Ancil E. Ratliff and William W. Ware as teachers, are successfully conducted, and have been the means of adding much life to the school and meeting. Their strong influence was supplemented recently by a series of meetings conducted by Aaron Napier, of Amboy, which resulted in much spiritual good that cannot be measured by numbers, and fourteen accessions to the church, of such character as to give new strength to the church. A power for much good goes out from this center to the surrounding community, and if Friends' churches everywhere were at work with an equal amount of influence, their force as a factor in our national life would be much increased. On Sunday, March the 29th, educational day was observed, and Prof. David W. Dennis, of Earlham College, by invitation, gave the sermons both morning and evening. There was a large attendance, and the building was decorated with banners from schools attended by members of the congregation. Many schools were represented in this way, including Fairmount Academy, Earlham, Penn, Haverford, Purdue University and Yale. Fourteen persons from a tile factory in the neighborhood, went in a big wagon both morning and evening. The sermons of Prof. Dennis were suited to the occasion, instructive and inspiring, and greatly appreciated by the audience. It is a day that will long be remembered by those who were so fortunate as to be present.

KANSAS YEARLY MEETING

League City, Texas.—The Friends' Church at League City was dedicated March 29th, and enough money was collected and subscribed to pay the $150.00 which was still due on the seats. The house is all finished and furnished completely, with a cost of something over $2,000.00. All the bills are paid, and there is no debt to be worrying the membership in the future, for which everybody feels thankful. Robert W. Douglas, of Ohio, preached the sermon. He has been spending the winter in California and, on the way back home, spent a few days at Friendswood, preaching three times. He then spent a few days at League City, resting and visiting socially. The people in this part of the country appreciated his services.

Kansas City, Missouri.—During April Arthur Jones, pastor, is preaching a series of Sabbath evening sermons on "The Spiritual Messages of Four Inspired Poems." They include: "Intimations of Immortality," by Wadsworth; "In Memoriam," by Tennyson; "A Death in the Desert," by Browning; and "The Eternal Goodness," by Whitier.

NEW YORK YEARLY MEETING

Union Springs.—On the afternoon of March 14th, the Friends' W. F. M. S. of Union Springs entertained the other three Missionary Societies of the village, Baptist, Presbyterian and Methodist, in the parlors of the Oakwood Seminary. The program was given by Anna J. Maris and Elizabeth L. Hazard. The subject under discussion was "The King's Treasury," treated in chapter V. of our text book, "The King's Business." It was helpfully given, showing thought and preparation. In addition to this, we had reports of Friends' work in Africa and Japan. At the conclusion of the program refreshments were served and a social hour was spent. All felt that the occasion was one of inspiration and increased fellowship, and the ladies separated with a determination to do better work for the Master.

New York City.—A lecture was given by Agnes L. Tierney, of Germantown, Pennsylvania, at Twentieth Street meeting house in New York City on March 26th. The subject was "A Glimpse of the Painted Desert," the same being illustrated by stereopticon views. Refreshments were served. The gathering was under the care of the reception committee of the meeting.

OHIO YEARLY MEETING

Tecumseh, Michigan.—An event of much interest was enjoyed March 27th, at the farm home of Albert A. Comfort and wife near Tecumseh. Some of their relatives and friends were invited there to celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of their marriage, which took place at the home of her parents, Phineas and Martha Parker, at Azalia, Indiana, a quarter of a century ago. Twenty persons besides their own family were present, and several others who had been invited were prevented from coming on account of the rain that continued all day. After a time of pleasant greetings among the guests, an elaborate dinner was served, and the afternoon was pleasantly spent in music and social converse. The host and hostess were presented with some gifts. Eight children have blessed this union, six of whom were present. All of the family are regular in their attendance of meeting and Bible School and are a blessing to the church.

WESTERN YEARLY MEETING

First Church, Indianapolis.—The members of First Friends' Sunday School, Indianapolis, Indiana, are actively identified with a movement recently started under the direction of the Church Federation of the city, of which M. C. Pearson, former pastor of First Friends' Church, is Secretary. A series of ten lectures has been arranged, covering all phases of Sunday-school work, divided into nine sections, each section being in charge of an expert along that particular line. This School of Methods is largely attended by the Sunday-school workers of the city, who feel that it is a rare opportunity for instruction and training.

Watseka, Illinois.—The Watseka Meeting observed March 1st as Missionary Day. The Bible School gave special attention to the subject, the pastor, F. J. Cope, preached a strong missionary sermon at the morning service, while the evening service, in charge of the missionary committee, consisted of papers, special music and recitations. There was no special missionary offering taken, as it was the thought of the committee to arouse the interest of the people in the missionary enterprise, believing that with interest aroused and with an intelligent conception of the need, voluntary offerings will result. It is the plan to have several such meetings during the year.

In his sermon on Christian Education recently, F. J. Cope, pastor of Watseka Meeting, urged upon parents the duty of securing for their children the best possible education, emphasizing the thought that that only is true education which develops the moral and spiritual equally with the mental and physical. He urged Friends to see to it that their schools and colleges be orthodox and that the faculty be such that by precept and example they will lead the students into a clear Christian experience and a closer walk with God.

MENDENHALL NONAGENARIAN

The ninetieth anniversary of the birth of Eli B. Mendenhall was celebrated Sunday, March 15, at a family gathering held at the Mendenhall home, Marshalltown, Iowa. During the afternoon Mr. and Mrs. Mendenhall held an informal reception, and light refreshments were served.

Mr. Mendenhall was one of the early residents of Hardin county, where he settled on a farm near New Providence in 1874. He came to Iowa from Minnesota, but prior to that time had been engaged in the mercantile business in Monrovia, Indiana, and in educational work at Richmond, Indiana, where he was a teacher in Earlham College, his alma mater. Mr. and Mrs. Mendenhall came to this city eighteen years ago.

Mr. Mendenhall is a native of Guilford county, North Carolina, where he was born March 15, 1824. He has five children, fifteen grandchildren, and seven great grandchildren.

WANTED—The name and address of every Friend coming to Chicago. Report for yourself or friends to Herman Newman, 1817 Republic building. Meeting for worship, 4413 Indiana Ave., First-day, 11 a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, AMERICAN FRIENDS' BOARD OF FOREIGN MISSIONS

The meeting of the Executive Committee held at Richmond, Indiana, April 1st, was smaller than usual, as three members could not be present. The Field Committee for Mexico met on the same day, and joined with them in the consideration of the Mexican situation. Both Committees gave unanimous and hearty approval of the suggested reorganization of the work in Mexico, as outlined in the meeting of all Boards working there, held at New York in January, a full statement of which appeared in THE AMERICAN FRIEND recently. It will mean a readjustment of our field with the Presbyterians who have been working in the same field, so there will be no further overlapping, but each will have a field well defined to be responsible for. Our field will probably be the southern half of the State of Tamaulipas, with Victoria as a center, where our main work now is, and the section with Matehuala as a center, as it has been heretofore. It is expected that the work at Matamoros will be transferred to the Presbyterians, they to purchase our property there. This will enable us to concentrate our strength in the south where we have the strongest hold.

It is designed by all Boards to push all the work in Mexico as soon as quiet is restored. It was felt by the committee that we must be prepared to undertake our share of that work with the greatest possible efficiency. Our most important needs are: First, to begin as soon as possible a strong evangelistic work to reach the population of our field at the earliest possible moment, as it will be our opportunity in the time of their sore need. Second, to build on our farm at Victoria a building suitable to the accommodation of at least fifty boys. We can only accommodate about twenty-six boys in our present quarters, and that very poorly. Nearly as many more who applied had to be turned away last September. The transfer of the boys to the farm will enable us to do a better work for the small children of which Miss Reader wrote in THE AMERICAN FRIEND some time ago, an article that moved many hearts to a desire to help them. This building and its equipment will require at least $12,000.00. The Committee felt that this was the opportune time to prepare for that work, by sending R. Solomon Tice out to our meetings to inform Friends of the need and solicit their help. They ask for him a warm helpful reception wherever he may come.

Our missionaries have passed through a severe experience in their loving service for that people, and are fully entitled to our sympathy. It is our work, and they are our representatives. It is our work they will present, and we should give quick and generous support to it. A committee of three was appointed to act for the Board in conjunction with the other Boards in the reorganization of the Mexican work.

The Cuban work was reported by their Field Committee through their Chairman, James Carey, Jr. The need of further educational facilities there of a higher grade than we are now furnishing, is very pressing, and some provision should be made at once. The Field Committee has the subject in their hands. Charles C. Haworth has been obliged to leave the field on account of his wife's health, and some one is greatly needed to take his place.

Brief reports were given of the work in Africa and Jamaica. The work in all these fields is prospering. The great problem is to keep the Mission force up to the required strength.

CHARLES E. TEBBETTS,
General Secretary.

COMING FROM ENGLAND

During the coming summer a small party of young Friends from England are coming to this country to attend some of the Friendly conferences, including that held at Winona Lake at the end of July, and the Haverford Summer School at the end of June. Besides, they expect to spend the intervening time in visits and less formal conferences in various communities of Friends "as way opens" for them to do so. Their plans and purposes are similar to those of the party who came over in 1912. While their itinerary is not yet fixed in detail, any persons who are interested to inquire further about it, may write to Henry J. Cadbury, Haverford, Pennsylvania.

SCHOOL OF MISSIONS

The Minnesota Summer School of Missions announces in a Foreword just issued the studies and leaders for 1914 as follows: "The Child in the Midst" and "Our World Family"—Mrs. D. B. Wells, Chicago, Illinois; "In Red Man's Land" and "Goodbird, the Indian"—Mrs. H. S. Hill, New York; Bible Study—"Teaching Them to Observe"—Mrs. John Ferguson, Monmouth, Illinois.

The School will be held in Merriam Park, St. Paul, June 17-23. The extension work embraces an Institute at Owatonna and a largely attended Normal Class for Study leaders conducted by the Education Secretary of the Episcopal Church in Minneapolis.

BIBLE SCHOOL LESSON

April 19.

Subject.—The Cost of Discipleship.Lesson.—Luke 14: 25-35.Golden Text.—Whosoever would save his life shall lose it; and whosoever shall lose his life for my sake shall find it.—Matt. 16: 25.Time.—January A.D. 30.Place.—In Perea on the way to Jerusalem.

Jesus was ever proclaiming against superficial religion. His tests of discipleship were always the severest tests. Worldly ambition would have welcomed the plaudits of the fickle, insincere multitudes. Jesus would have whole hearted loyalty or none.

One is reminded of Gideon's test, or of Garibaldi's offer of hunger and thirst and cold and heat to his soldiers, asking only for those who love "our country and glory."

Only a man who is already successful or who is sure of his ultimate triumph can set up such standards of loyalty. Jesus was at the high tide of his popularity. Great multitudes were following him, probably expecting that the time was at hand when he would set up his earthly kingdom.

There was no better time to strike at superficial loyalty. Discipleship meant something more than loud acclaims, the throwing of hats or the plaudits of the multitude. It was a custom of Jesus "to give strong utterance to important truths, in order to be more impressive, trusting to the common sense of his hearers, as well as to their knowledge of his general position."

The true disciple must be willing to bear his own cross, to take whatever comes of sacrifice, of persecution, of suffering. He must count the cost to the end of the journey, for Jesus must have workers upon whom he can rely in the stress of hardship and of storm. He must hold Christ first in his affections.

The thoughtless builder has no place in the real kingdom. No one is worthy of discipleship who at any time is in danger of holding some other interest in greater esteem.

There are tests today in the business, social and political world that are as great as any that Jesus imposed when he talked to the multitudes on his way to Jerusalem. No merchant who uses a short yardstick can serve at the table of the Lord. No one who votes for the saloon can claim fellowship with the Savior. No one who serves the world and yields to its temptations in society can have a place in the ranks of Christian discipleship. "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear."

PERSONAL MENTION

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR

April 19.

Topic.—The Consecration of Time.—Eccl. 3: 1-8. (Sabbath Observance Meeting.)

The nation needs an awakening on the question of having a day of rest, a day that will be kept holy unto the Lord. "The Sabbath was made for man," for his benefit, for his recuperation, for his spiritual uplift.

Not only does man need a day of rest physically, but he needs the spiritual refreshing that comes from collective communion in the religious service.

Some strong souls might be able to retain the spiritual life without the service of worship, but the average person would soon lose his spiritual freshness without this time of renewal.

Let the members discuss various ways in which the Sabbath is profaned and abused. Let others discuss the positive benefits of this holy day of rest.

He was a life long member of the Society of Friends, and a beloved physician. He was a graduate of Moses Brown School at Providence, and at the time of his death was a member of the Executive Board and of the Finance Committee of that institution. He was the Chief of Staff and Chairman of the Medical Board of the Woonsocket Hospital, and a trustee of the State Sanatorium for tubercular patients. He was honorable and fearless, ever active for the interest of the city and state. In early manhood Dr. Monroe married Carrie Remington, who died in 1889, and in 1911 he married Jean McGregor Dewar, who survives him. Among the honorary pall bearers at his funeral were the Governor of the State and the Mayor of his City.

EAGER TO WORK

Health Regained by Right Food

The average healthy man or woman is usually eager to be busy at some useful task or employment.

But let dyspepsia or indigestion get hold of one, and all endeavor becomes a burden.

"A year ago, after recovering from an operation," writes a Mich. lady, "my stomach and nerves began to give me much trouble.

"At times my appetite was voracious, but when indulged, indigestion followed. Other times I had no appetite whatever. The food I took did not nourish me, and I grew weaker than ever.

"I lost interest in everything and wanted to be alone. I had always had good nerves, but now the merest trifle would upset me and bring on a violent headache. Walking across the room was an effort and prescribed exercise was out of the question.

"I had seen Grape-Nuts advertised, but did not believe what I read, at the time. At last, when it seemed as if I were literally starving, I began to eat Grape-Nuts.

"I had not been able to work for a year, but now after two months on Grape-Nuts I am eager to be at work again. My stomach gives me no trouble now, my nerves are steady as ever, and interest in life and ambition have come back with the return to health."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

William I. Kent directed the services, assisted by the Baptist minister; Thomas J. Battey, of Providence, delivered the address, the meeting house being filled to overflowing with physicians, state and city officials, and others.

TESTIMONIAL.

No. 95 CLAIRMOUNT AVE., DETROIT, February 4, 1910.

Farquhar Furnace Co., Wilmington, Ohio:

GENTLEMEN—After using the Farquhar Furnace one winter, I can cheerfully recommend it for cost of running, ease of operation, and general good results obtained. Have had experience with Hot Air, Steam, and Hot Water Heaters, and have found the FARQUHAR far more satisfactory than any heating apparatus I have ever seen.

I hesitated before installing my furnace, on account of first cost, and was somewhat doubtful regarding the strong claims made for it by your representative, but actual test has verified all claims made for it, and were I to build again, it would be the FARQUHAR for me.

You are at liberty to use this letter, over my signature, as you may deem advisable, as I feel that the FARQUHAR FURNACE cannot be recommended too highly, or advertised too strongly. It will make "good."

Yours very truly,

(Signed) E. C. LORING.

MISSIONARY NUMBER

The Call of Christ to Me

From the far frontier on the border line,
Where scattered hamlets are beaded on steel;
From the roistering life in the camp or the mine,
Where the lush of prairie grass follows the wheel;
By the orchard rills of mountain dyke,
Where the cattle trail o'er measureless range;
Where fitful, tropic warfares strike
And the isles are rife with the fever of change;
Where the missionary labors in parish wide,
And the chapel car rolls to ministries new;
From the lonely cabins of mountain side,
From plantation singers of dusky hue;
Where immigrant throngs are streaming forth
From Israel's tribes, with a veil on the heart;
From Indian wigwam, or frozen north,—
I hear the call which wakes with a start,
The call of the Christ to me.

And what dost thou answer Him, O my soul?
Is it nothing to thee as the ages roll,
That the Lord of Life should suffer in vain?
That He who was Prince in the Realm of Pain
Should seek for the sin-stricken children of men,
That by way of the cross He might bring them again
To the fold of His care—His infinite care,
That thou shouldst turn from this, His prayer,
And deaden thine ear to His wondrous plea,
The call of the Christ to me.

Complete In Him

I lay me down to sleep with little care
Whether my waking shall be here or there.
I bring my day's work, 'tis but poorly done,
Though I have wrought since rising of the sun,
But He who set my task knows what I lack of skill,
And well He knows, I long to do His blessed will.
And I am sure when to the Master's feet
I come abashed, my work so incomplete,
He will be there to comfort and make clear
The things I do not understand while toiling here.
And where I lack perfection He'll supply His own,
Then I'll hear the Master say, "For His sake, well done!"

Bible School officers will please take notice.

A Noble Woman Gone

The temperance people of America will mourn the death on April 6th of Lillian M. N. Stevens, President of the National W. C. T. U. and Vice-President of the international organization. Mrs. Stevens has been a leader in temperance reform work for many years, having succeeded the lamented Frances E. Willard. Her voice has been heard in nearly every state in behalf of prohibition. In 1911 on the evening before the vote was taken in Maine, she announced the slogan of national prohibition and lived to see a formidable movement develop throughout the country in behalf of this issue. The country will mourn her loss as one among the noblest of our American women.

A Word About Obituary Notices

Every religious journal finds the problem of printing obituary notices to be a perplexing one. This becomes doubly so in the case of a publication like THE AMERICAN FRIEND, which has such limited space. We are compelled to ask for brevity on the part of those who send in obituary notices. In practically every instance local papers can be relied upon to give extended notices, while a paper which circulates all over the country and in foreign lands can not be expected to give more than the briefest facts. When we are compelled to rewrite these notices in order to abbreviate them it is generally unsatisfactory both to us as well as to the bereaved friends and relatives.

Recent No-License Gains

The temperance forces have gained some notable victories in recent local elections. In Michigan, on April 6th, the dry forces had a net gain of one county in which the state capital is located. On the 7th something like 1,000 saloons were voted out in Illinois, the victory in a number of places being due to the votes of women who for the first time exercised the right of franchise in that state. Twenty-two counties were added to the dry counties, making fifty-two in all out of 102 counties in the state. On the same day the dry forces gained some substantial victories in both Minnesota and Nebraska. The recent order of Secretary of War, Daniels, enforcing complete prohibition on all battleships, is regarded as a distinct gain for the temperance cause. The Chicago Record-Herald, one of the great newspapers of the country, has announced that it will not contract for any more liquor advertising. Hearings are being held this week before the Congressional Committees in favor of national prohibition. The cause of prohibition is on the up-grade throughout America.

Reports from Korea show a present native Christian membership of 40,000 as contrasted with 10,000 a decade ago. In spite of loss of country, repeated persecutions and other trying experiences, these 40,000 have come through strong and devoted. A young Korean said recently: "If you were to take a club and try to drive out the believers now left in the Korean Church, you could not do it."

More than fifty years ago mission work in Egypt was apportioned to the United Presbyterian Church. From a modest beginning large numbers of churches and communicants, schools for boys and girls, two flourishing colleges, a theological seminary and several hospitals are doing a noble work, from Alexandria, through upper Egypt, and beyond Khartum.

On the basis of observations, the Shimpō calculates that on an average Sabbath morning, 5,000 Tokyo citizens are listening to Protestant sermons. This means one out of 400 citizens going to the Protestant Christian Church each week.—The Continent.

The Spirit of Unity in Missionary Work

One of the most important developments in the field of missions is the growing unity of purpose and plans which is characterizing all the operations. Quite naturally theology has little part to play in missionary activity, and it is the varied interpretations of theology which have had most to do in marking lines of denominational cleavage. Among the heathen and among all who know not God it is the simple story of the life and work of Jesus that wins the hearts of men to the Christian life.

In strong contrast to this spirit of brotherly fellowship is the controversy awakened by the conference at Kikuyu in British East Africa, where the Episcopalian Bishops of Uganda and Mombasa presided over a conference to which the Non-conformists Clergy and laity were invited. This action has raised a storm of protest in "high church" circles in England, that bodes no good to the unity of gospel work, either in that country or in missionary lands.

Whatever may happen in the home land, it is practically certain that the Moslem world, and the lands of Confucius and Buddha can never be won to the Christian faith by the divided ranks of Christendom. The one unanswerable appeal to the heathen world must come from a Church united in faith and in its purpose to emphasize the supremacy of a spiritual kingdom in which there are no antagonistic camps of believers.

Probably the day will never come when Christian unity will be absolute, especially as applied to organization, but the days of close communion are over. The democracy of the Christian religion must reign throughout the earth. The universality of the gospel as applied to human needs in every land and in every age is the bedrock principle of the Christian faith. It is the embodiment of the faith which George Fox proclaimed when the revelation came to him that there was one, even Jesus, who could speak to his condition.

The doctrine of the priesthood of believers is the only one that can ever appeal to a world that is tired of red tape religions, that bar the masses from contact with Jehovah by a mass of inexplicable ceremonies and outward ordinances. Christianity can never be propagated by traditionalism or by the perpetuation of rites in memory of a dead Savior. It is the Christ who suffered for all mankind but who is alive forevermore, who is ready to manifest Himself to every heart that will but open its doors to receive Him, He it is who must be held up for the redemption of all men.

The problem of missions in the foreign field is not greatly unlike the problem of evangelism at home. In either case Jesus Christ must be revealed directly to the consciousness of needy men and women, or else the message becomes a sham, an idle creed, a meaningless jumble of words. A professional religion has no place in the economy of missions, as it has no place in the plans of evangelism. The missionary propaganda must "make good" in its claims of a gospel that will change human propensities, transform human affections and desires and revolutionize human conduct. It will fail if bitterness and strife characterize its activities. A bright day dawned for the cause of world evangelization when the federative spirit began to operate in developing a workable understanding among the various missionary agencies. It portends the ultimate triumph of the world-wide movement to bring all men to a knowledge of the Lord.

A Conference of Men

Last week we endeavored to emphasize the need of a great inspiration among the men of our denomination. We are sure that to many the argument was not convincing. Our hope is that to the majority there will come the feeling that something must be done speedily to bring to our Quaker men an enlarged vision both of opportunity and responsibility in the work to which God is calling His Church.

We know a young man, a college graduate, a man of ability and of considerable promise, who within recent weeks has joined another denomination, all because he was not able to feel that there was any future for him in the Church of his birth, commensurate with his aspirations for service in the religious field. We know another, whose talents are wholly lost to the Church, while remaining a member, mainly because the Church has never laid claim to the best of his life in any tangible, constructive way. These are but a type of scores of others scattered all through our meetings from east to west, to whom no impelling call has ever come for consecrated, sacrificial service in the work of the Church.

To these must be added some thousands of other men, whose names are on our membership rolls, men of capability they are for the most part, but men whose influence counts for little in the mechanism of the Church, to whom there has come no inspiration, impelling them to do anything worth while in behalf of the Church as an agency for the betterment of mankind. It is such men as these to whom the Church needs to speak, upon whom it needs to lay its hands and from whom it needs to exact efficient, consecrated service.

If at a conference of our men we could get the broad outlook and catch the inspiration which men like Robert E. Speer, John R. Mott, Charles Stelzle, J. Campbell White and Edward A. Steiner can bring to us, along with the leading men of our own denomination, who have a grasp of the great problems which concern the Church in this age, the benefit which would come to the entire denomination would be well nigh immeasurable. A conference such as suggested does not have to be held on a given date. It could easily be arranged at a time when such talent was available.

Problems concerning the relationship which we as a body should sustain to the great work of the Church of Christ in the world are problems of the highest concern about which our Church needs an awakening. Problems of internal organism that concern an adjustment of departments and the planning of work commensurate with our capabilities as a Church are fruitful subjects about which our Quaker men need to be thinking. Our financial problems are pressing for adjustment and solution.

The last Five Years Meeting planned wisely for a working departmental organism, but it neglected to provide for an adequate income or to devise a method by which an adequate income would be assured. In financial standing and ability, Friends are not probably far below the average of other denominations. In actual giving we are far below the average, and without an awakening of our Quaker men, the outlook is not likely to be improved. If the vision which recently came to our Friends on the Western Coast gathered at Los Angeles and which was detailed in last week's AMERICAN FRIEND, is ever realized, it will be after the Church has been stirred to action by a profound conviction of its ability as well as its duty to raise two million dollars for the purposes named in the resolutions.

We believe that the proposed conference is fraught with the greatest possibilities for the Society of Friends in America. It is the opening of the door of a great opportunity. It is no time for surface examinations or the application of local remedies. It is a time rather when we need to consider the deeper currents that are operating upon our denominational life. So far as editorial discussion is concerned we leave the subject with Friends and the Executive Committee.

Growth of Christianity in India

[The following is an editorial which lately appeared in the Civil and Military Gazette, a semi-official paper published at Lahore, North India.]

One of the most interesting chapters of Mr. Gait's report on the census of India deals with religion and with the rapid increase in the number of Christians. The total number of Christians in India at the time of the census was 3,876,203 or 12 per mille of the population. During the decade since the previous census the increase was 32.6 per cent., and the number of Christians has more than doubled since 1881. The proportional increase, by the way, is by far the greatest in Punjab, where there are now three times as many Christians as in 1901; in the Central Provinces and Berar the increase is 169 per cent., and in Hyderabad, Assam and the United Provinces the increases are 136, 89 and 75 per cent. respectively. The Anglican Communion has added only 9 per cent., but these figures are vitiated by the fact that in 1901 all who described themselves as Protestants were accredited to the Anglican Communion. The real increase is probably at least 14 per cent. Baptists have grown much more rapidly, and they now approximate to the Anglicans in their number of Indian Christians. Lutherans, chiefly found in Madras and in Behar and Orissa, have increased by 41 per cent., and Methodist adherents are 2½ times as numerous as a decade ago. Presbyterians have achieved even more remarkable results. With 181,000 adherents they are more than three times as numerous as in 1901. The Punjab has shown a phenomenal increase among Presbyterians, whose numbers have grown from 5,000 to 95,000 in the ten years. In Sialkot and Gujranwala [two of the most important of our own mission districts] alone there are now 52,000 Presbyterians as against 500 in 1901. Most of the converts belong to the Chuhra, Chamar and depressed classes. The Salvationists, too, have shown remarkable activity in the Punjab, their numbers having grown from a few hundreds to 18,000; they are found chiefly in Gurdaspur, Lyallpur, and Amritsar. Roman Catholics have more than doubled their numbers in the Punjab, and gained 18 per cent. in Behar and Orissa and 62 per cent. in Burma.

Mr. Gait notes that the greatest success of Christian missions is attained amongst aboriginal tribes, and among Hindus. The main obstacle to the success of the missionary propaganda is the fear of social ostracism. The low caste convert has much less to lose than the high caste, and he gains in facilities for education, assistance in getting employment, and the like; and he can drop his despised caste designation. The great majority of the converts from Hinduism belong to the lowest castes, to whom conversion means an accession of respectability as well as a cleaner and a purer life. The social difficulty grows less as the number of converts increase, for if the convert is turned out of one community he obtains the entry to another. [This complaint is now largely under control among Protestant missions owing to inter-mission comity. The Roman Catholics and Salvation Army, however, in our own field give us a great deal of trouble along this line and it makes discipline doubly difficult.] A well known Roman Catholic missionary in Chota Nagpur writes regarding inducements to conversion: "As a general rule religious motives are out of the question. They want protection against zamindari and police extortions, and assistance in the endless litigation forced upon them by zamindars. . . . Personally I know of some cases where individuals came over from religious motives. But these cases are rare." [This conclusion of the R. C. missionary is by no means universally true among Protestant missions. Some there doubtless are who profess conversion from unworthy or worldly motives, but the majority have at least a desire for a better life.] Most missions are careful to baptize no one who does not give proof of being at heart a Christian, but a few accept all who are willing to enter the fold, and occasionally take in whole villages in a body. In such cases it is not surprising that the converts are apt to apostatize.

As to the effect of Christianity on the converts, Mr. Blunt, the United Presbyterian census superintendent, draws attention to the greater cleanliness of dress and habits among converts as compared with the classes from whom they are drawn. The missionaries are now, he says, being rewarded by the appearance of the mens sana. "The new convert, may be, is no better than his predecessors; but a new generation, the children of the first generation of converts, is now growing up. . . . The children of the converts, born in Christianity, are very different to their parents; their grandchildren will be better still.

"The Hindu fellows of these converts have now to acknowledge, not only that they are in many material ways better off than themselves, but that they are also better men." Similarly a Bengali gentleman says: "The most careless observer can tell the house of a Christian convert of some years' standing from that of his non-Christian fellow-tribesman by the greater cleanliness of the Christian's house, and the general neatness and orderliness of everything about it." The Mysore superintendent, himself a Hindu, says, that missionaries work mainly among the backward classes, and "that the enlightening influence of Christianity is patent in the higher standard of comfort of the converts, and their sober, disciplined, and busy lives." The educational work of the missions among the backward classes demands separate treatment.—United Presbyterian.

The Work at Puerto Padre, Cuba

JANUARY 12, 1914.

Dear Friends and Christian Endeavorers:

This Island has been and is yet in a sad plight. Ever since its discovery it has been overshadowed by a terrible superstition, due largely to a decayed Roman religion and influenced by a dark paganism. Though it is a country in which hundreds of fine church edifices are found, yet it is an Island that knew little of the Gospel Message until some fourteen years ago when the Americans brought peace and new hope to an abused country. New ideas, new sanitary regulations, scientific improvements and the Gospel came on the same steamer.

The mission work was begun by some four or five denominations. Though there are no strict boundary lines, no territory especially allotted to each denomination, yet each recognizes that it is responsible for the spread of the gospel in some distinct section; thus the Friends feel responsible for a part of Cuba lying at the eastern end and on the northern shore extending from a point east of Banes to a short distance west of Puerto Padre. With a map in hand, draw a circle with Gibara as the center, let the radii extend to Holguin and the two points mentioned above and you will have a semi-circle that represents Friends territory in eastern Cuba. In Havana province there is also a small section worked by this Society. The Methodists, the Baptists and the Presbyterians are our brothers in the work.

Our work is conducted from centers out. There are in eastern Cuba four central stations, Banes, Gibara, Holguin and Puerto Padre. I believe there are two in western Cuba. Around each of these central stations there are a small number of out-stations; some are large towns, some are but small villages, while much of the territory is country filled with the most unattractive thatched roofed cabins that could be imagined. In nearly all these homes there are large families living in complete ignorance of their needs educationally and morally. Since but few can read, the possession of a Bible would do them little good. Public schools are very scarce in the country, but as yet the missions have not been able to do anything for the country masses more than an occasional visit to hold Gospel services. We look forward to the day when we shall have enough native workers well prepared to enter this neglected field and establish schools and organize churches. Schools and churches must go hand in hand or we shall do little more than re-establish a religion of superstition. The fact that we are constantly called upon to establish schools in small towns is a proof of the opportunity that prevails here.

We have schools at each of the above mentioned stations. In each there are from three to five teachers, one or two of which are natives. An attempt is made to carry the pupils to the eighth grade. We find it hard to always have a well graded school because the attendance is so irregular. There are, however, several that finish our schools each year and must go to other higher schools or stop school entirely. We lose a great deal every year because we have no school to which to send our graduates; so many go to Catholic schools, which are glad to receive them.

This year, up to the present date, we have in all four of the central schools more than 250 pupils enrolled. At this station, Puerto Padre, we have an enrollment of 75. We occupy all three of the rooms, there being three teachers, Miss Lena Hadley, Emma Lopez and myself. The daily routine is very much as it is in the district school in the States. The school opens at eight o'clock and closes at eleven; again at 1:30 and closes at 4:30. Every morning at nine o'clock we have chapel service. This consists of singing and Scripture reading, in which all take part; explanations of difficult passages are made, closing the service with prayer and another song. Many of the children are prejudiced, and at first do not like the religious exercises, but they soon get so they are glad when the hour arrives to pass into the chapel. When we consider that nearly all these children are from the best families in the town and the surrounding country, and that nearly all the parents are unbelievers or indifferent to religion, then we can begin to realize what a great opportunity we have. We cannot foresee the results; we can only pray with you, dear friends, that the harvest will be great.

Many of the day school pupils are in the Sunday School of the station. The past year has brought us rich blessings in this latter work. In our Sunday School we have about 70 enrolled. There are six classes, four of which are taught by young native workers that have been trained here at this station. A strong Home Department is conducted. The Assistant Pastor, a young consecrated native, visits each home every week, making a thorough explanation of the lesson. He is now trying to put a Bible in every home, and on his last round, succeeded in selling six Bibles.

The Christian Endeavor is really the strongest organization that we have at this station. The membership is about 30. The meetings held each Friday night are usually well attended. The natives make very good leaders and we often have very interesting meetings. The society has six active committees, which all together accomplish a great deal of work.

The young men of the C. E. have formed themselves into a club for the purpose of studying under the directorship of the pastor. This club calls itself the "Educational Club," meets twice a week, and has originated a book fund to which each member pays fifty cents a month.

There are preaching services twice a week, at which there is a very good attendance. We are expecting a revival meeting in May. We have already commenced to make preparations for this by having cottage prayer meetings each Wednesday evening in the home of some one who should ask for it to be held in their home. The Lord has wonderfully blessed us in these meetings.

Yours for Christ and the Church,
HENRY AND ALMA COX.

CORRESPONDENCE

CHELtenham, PA., Third Mo. 14, 1914.

By letter from Minnie P. Bowles, dated Tokio, Second Month 20, 1914, we are informed of the terrible suffering of the people in northern Japan from famine, and in the south from the volcanic eruption. Last summer's rice crop entirely failed. Seed planted in the spring was destroyed by freezing weather, and as rice is the staple article of food in Japan, people in the province of Hokaido are on the verge of starvation. They are existing on the fallen and dried leaves of last autumn, and on reop. These boiled together with chopped rice straw make their chief food supply. Old people and children are dying from lack of proper nourishment and many, both men and women, commit suicide that there may be one less to feed in the family. It is a heart-rending tale of actual suffering and one that must appeal to every humane person.

At a meeting of the Friends' Foreign Mission Committee held in Tokio, Japan, Second Month 6, 1914, the following minute was adopted: "The great suffering at present in Japan entailed by the volcanic eruption in the south, and by the famine in the north, was brought before us, and the Publicity Committee was instructed to send reports of conditions and appeals for help."

In 1908 there was a failure of the rice crop in Japan and the people passed through a similar experience, though not nearly so severe and wide-spread as at present. Friends in Philadelphia and vicinity at that time contributed twenty-seven hundred dollars for relief of the suffering and starving Japanese. Shall we in this terrible crisis do less?

Friends are ever ready to respond to appeals for relieving their distressed fellow beings, and need only to have this pitiful condition presented authoritatively before them to render assistance.

Relief funds will be gratefully received and acknowledged and forwarded promptly to Japan.

Funds may be sent to JOHN WAY,
Assistant Treasurer Provident Life and Trust Co.,

The Emperor of Germany has made the following distribution of the "National Gift" offered to the Christian missions to the amount of 3,500,000 marks in round numbers: Missionary societies, 2,825,000 marks ($678,000); allied institutions, 175,000 marks ($42,000). The balance is reserved for an adjustment fund and for maintenance of a permanent organization.

If heaven, with insistent voice,
Shall call in duty's way,
When shall we strive to do the task?
Today, my friend, today.

Who spends his life in loving deeds at duty's earnest call
Shall taste life's rich experience when twilight shadows fall.

A Monthly Meeting Chronicle

(Wherein is told the story of a Monthly Meeting which caught a vision, and with some misgivings decided to improve an opportunity.)

BY JUNIUS JUNIOR

XIV.

Another month had become history, and the major portion of the members of Slow Valley Monthly Meeting settled down to one of the most important sessions they had ever held. The evolution from a dead quiescent state into one of remarkable spiritual activity had been complete. The call of the community had been heard and the response had been more hearty than even the most optimistic could have anticipated.

Slow Valley Meeting was in truth justifying its existence. It had become as a city set upon a hill that could not be hid. It was now the center of the religious life of the neighborhood, and its ideals were rapidly becoming the ideals of the whole community. The Scripture truth was being verified: "He that loseth his life for my sake shall find it." By making the community the object of first concern and forgetting self the members had found that new life and power had come to themselves.

In the devotional service, the spirit of praise and thanksgiving characterized every utterance. The new pastor, conscious of the great change that had come to the congregation and sensing the potentiality of a religious organism bent upon giving the best possible account of its stewardship, preached with an unction that touched every heart as he told again the story of God's covenant with Abraham, and the crowning of his faith in the blessings that had come and were still coming to all the nations of the earth. There was a note of leadership about his utterances that caught the attention of the more discerning, as in the closing moments he analyzed the Christian life and set forth with distinctness what consecrated discipleship would mean for any community and for the great world outside.

"This is the golden age of the Christian era," he exclaimed. "God is speaking directly to His Church today, no less than he did to the old prophet on the plains of Haran and of Shechem. The light of His truth has penetrated into every land, and the Christian world is hearing anew the command of the Savior of earth to go 'into all the world and preach the gospel to the whole creation.' The great mission of the Church is to lead all men, at home and abroad, to know God and to obtain eternal life through Jesus Christ. The world is waking from its sleep of indifference and Christianity is being challenged to meet its tasks as in no other age.

"The awakening that has come to Slow Valley Meeting and to this entire community is typical of the times in which we live. The Church must make religion the dominant element in every phase of human life, and it must justify its existence by its ability to shed the light of gospel truth wherever humanity is groping in darkness and indifference, wherever humanity needs a Savior.

"Here in Newtown we are only as yet upon the threshold of better days. Our mission will not have been ended so long as men and women are still under the blighting power of sin. God is calling us still to higher ground, to more consecrated living, to more efficient service in His name. In humbleness of heart, but with obedience to do the will of the Father let us go forward, putting, as Drummond has said, 'the reins of our life into the hands of Jesus Christ'."

The power of the sermon was still upon every heart, as the Clerk read the minute which led to the business of the meeting. The various committees reported favorably upon each application for membership, and the meeting directed that on the morrow at the morning service a formal welcome be extended to all who had recently become members by letter, or by request. Formal application for nineteen others was made, and the customary committees were named to make the investigations.

Delegates were named to the ensuing Quarterly Meeting, and announcement was made that the building fund had been oversubscribed by $27.45. It was reported that a very successful conference of the churches of the city had been held in behalf of the United Mission Campaign, one of the district team workers being present to explain the every-member canvass in all its details. A congregational meeting on this subject had also been held on the previous Sabbath afternoon, and hearty endorsement had been given to a thorough and systematic canvass of the entire membership in behalf, not only of the church expenses but of the benevolences as well.

After considerable discussion the meeting appointed a committee of five to select the canvassing teams, and directed that the permanent canvass be made on the second Sabbath in March. The canvassers were instructed to secure pledges as far as possible not only from every adult but from all the children as well. It was explained that the children should be trained in the matter of giving and should be taught to be interested in all the work of the Church.

While some differences of opinion arose, the canvassers were finally directed to solicit pledges not only for current expenses, but for the various departments of the Church, although some advocated the plan of taking pledges for the work which the Church was doing for itself, and that which it was doing for others, leaving it to each of the two general committees, about to be named, to determine the amounts which should go to the work of each sub-committee. The arguments that each subscriber had the right to designate the object of his generosity won the day, however, and the canvassers were instructed accordingly. The committee to appoint the canvassers was instructed to drill them carefully in the details of the work to be done.

The Nominating Committee selected to name the two Central Committees of the meeting made a report which indicated a vast amount of work and revealed the painstaking care which had been used to secure appropriate appointees. Our farmer friend headed the committee to have charge of the work which the Church was to do for itself through appropriate sub-committees; while the merchant took the chairmanship of the committee which was to have a care over the work to be done in behalf of others not immediately connected with the meeting. For an hour the meeting discussed this new arrangement, and it was evident that all were not yet convinced of the wisdom of the action taken, and would not be wholly satisfied except as the results later on should justify the procedure which had been agreed upon.

The committees were advised to proceed prayerfully and with extreme care, having in mind the appointment of members best adapted to the work of the various sub-committees. They were directed to hold a joint conference in order to adjust properly the question of assigning the various departments to the appropriate committee, a report of their action to be made at the March meeting.

The Bible School Committee reported that in accordance with the request made a month ago, a new Bible School had been opened in the Turkey Hollow neighborhood, with a present enrollment of twenty-four. It was stated also that the enrollment at the Bennett school house now numbered sixty-four, and the services for worship every two weeks, under the care of the school teacher, were largely attended. The Christian Endeavor Society was growing rapidly in interest and attendance, and a Junior Society was in contemplation as soon as spring opened. The class of neglected children under the care of the two C. E. girls had grown to twenty-one.

A request came from the joint committee in charge of the work among the foreigners for authority to select a competent woman to serve as city missionary among the alien population of Newtown, and that Slow Valley Meeting do its share in providing the necessary expenses of such work. It appeared that $400.00 would be the meeting's share of this expenditure, and there were some who by force of habit balked at such an outlay. In deference to their judgment, action was withheld and a special committee was named to solicit contributions for this purpose and report to the next meeting.

The chairman of the Temperance Committee reported that a mass temperance meeting would be held in two weeks at the meeting house, and that members of the other city churches would participate. This led to some discussion about moral conditions in the city and some suggestions were made that an appeal should be sent to the city administration for a betterment of civic conditions. The hour was late and further consideration of the matter was deferred.

After announcement that a reception was to be given the new pastor on the following Monday evening, the concluding minute was read and after a prayer by one of the women, the company dispersed with a broadened vision of what it takes to be a live Church in a progressive community.

New York Quakerism Class

Greetings to all the Groups in America Studying the History and Principles of Friends:

In the hope that by getting into closer touch with each other we may strengthen the bond of the Principle of Friends for which we stand, we send this message, telling you of our work this winter, and asking you in return to send us a message bearing a report of your work. Each year we find we are more eager to continue our class, which is now in its tenth year. Many of the original members are still with us, and every year new ones join bringing their fresh points of view and varied interests.

From fifteen to twenty meet each week. Sometimes it is at a member's house for a simple evening meal at which there is general informal discussion, after which the more formal subject of the evening is taken up by one or two prepared beforehand to lay it before us. But it is always kept informal enough for any member to interrupt with a question or remark. Frequently we meet in a room in the meeting house where we cook our own supper, and enjoy all taking a hand. Or again we may meet after supper, having the discussion first, and very light refreshments before going home. We have found it added depth to our gatherings to have a period of worship before breaking up, it may be in silence, or a prayer is sometimes offered, suggested perhaps, by the topic of the evening discussion.

We are fortunate in having among our numbers those of widely different belief and interests, and from different parts of our country; a great many phases of life are represented, and one of our cardinal principles being free speech, we learn constantly of new problems which have to be faced in the lives of our own members or of which they have heard from others. We are glad to have every point of view expressed no matter how widely it may differ from the view of any one of us. In studying Church History we have found how ever changing were beliefs which people have expressed, and we have tried to keep ourselves open to hear any thought, new or old, if sincerely spoken.

Some of us are working along Social Service lines and are deep in all the problems that a big city with its vast foreign population presents. The general theme for the winter's work in our group meetings has been "Friends and Human Needs" with the accompanying list of sub-topics.

Growing out of the Quakerism Class came a series of pilgrimages to meetings within a radius of fifty miles of New York. A group of five to fifteen attend the meeting for worship in the morning, then a box lunch in which both visitors and home Friends join, gives a jolly opportunity for "getting acquainted." Following this is the conference on some previously announced topic, such as "What does my religion mean to me?" These conferences have been very encouraging.

Another outcome from our winter has been a series of meetings held in Columbia University neighborhood on First-day afternoon, where members from several branches of the Society of Friends, and a number not members, have rejoiced in meeting together in unity for worship. We strive to carry into life today some measure of that spirit which was in Fox, and Penn, and Woolman, and Whittier, and Elizabeth Fry. The wonderful message of those giant Friends would, we feel sure, speak to the need of the world today if we were but able to voice it, and we are constantly surprised at the response we get from those not members of the Society of Friends. The world is calling for an individual Spiritual Faith. Can the Society of Friends answer? We feel that we need all the help from others we can get. Help us by telling us your struggles and aspirations.

Missionary News

In Persia, the majority of the pupils in higher mission schools are now Mohammedans, and in some of them the teachers are Christian converts from Islam, and there is a wide-open door to unhindered evangelism.

The Associated Mayor of Tokyo, Hon. D. Togawa, has been in America studying city conditions. Sunday School men have assisted in making his stay in America notable, in New York, Washington, Pittsburgh and Chicago. After visiting one of Brooklyn's Sunday Schools, the mayor said he had been wonderfully impressed by the 30 to 50-story buildings in New York, but was more impressed by the Sunday School work as he saw it. Mr. Togawa is a Presbyterian elder, and member of parliament.

American Presbyterians have of late been making vigorous efforts to meet the situation existing in the new China. Special emphasis has been laid upon the need for greatly enlarged and improved equipment for educational work. Nearly $1,000,000 have been given or pledged for enterprises for which the Presbyterian Board is solely responsible. Besides this, a few people have provided a fund of no less than $750,000 to be used for the erection of new buildings for Nanking Union University and Shantung Christian University.

The Ninth Triennial Conference of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Union of Friends will be held at Muncie, Indiana, May 7 to 12. An elaborate program has been arranged of reports and addresses. Several lessons in Bible Study will be given by Miss Angy Manning Taylor. One service will be devoted to a "Mass Meeting with our Missionaries," while the Yearly Meeting Presidents will have charge of another session. All delegates are asked to send their names and addresses to Mrs. Odessa Rayle, 516 South Mound Street, Muncie, Indiana, so that comfortable homes may be provided.

The tenth session of the Summer School of Missions, under the auspices of the Interdenominational Committee of the Central West for Missions, will be held at Winona Lake, Indiana, opening Thursday afternoon, June 25th, with the first lecture on the study book, and closing with the last lecture of the study course on Thursday morning, July 2d. Bible study will be conducted each morning by Miss Angy Manning Taylor, whose ability in this department is well known. The general theme for study is "Social Service in Christian Missions." The first six lectures will be based upon the text-book, "The Child in the Midst."

The Third Annual Missionary Conference of Indiana Students was held at Earlham College, Richmond, Indiana, February 27, 28 and March 1, 1914. This conference which has become a regular part of the work of the Indiana Student Volunteer Union had previously been held at the College of Missions at Irvington, but this year owing to the keen interest in missionary work at Earlham it was decided to hold the conference here. Moses Bailey of Earlham has been president of the state organization for the past year. There were about eighty delegates in attendance, exclusive of the Earlham delegation, and they represented practically all the colleges of the state. Addresses were given by Dr. Samuel W. Zweemer, W. H. Ramsaur, Prof. J. G. McGavran, Miss Nannie Hopper, W. H. Edwards, Dr. S. R. Lyons, Mrs. Laura Delany Garst, President A. J. Bowen and several others.

A gift of $1,000,000 to the Church of the Disciples of Christ was announced recently by E. A. Corey, secretary of the Laymen's Missionary Movement of that denomination. The gift was made by Mr. R. A. Long, of Kansas City, and was first given to the public during the Student Volunteer Convention meeting in Kansas City. Mr. Long's gift is on condition that the denomination shall raise an additional five millions, the money to be devoted to extending the work of the missionary societies of the denomination and to a fund to educate one thousand men for missionary work at home and abroad in colleges maintained by the denomination.

Since a few missionaries have ventured into Tibet, it is rather common for missionary speakers to say that the whole world is now open to the Gospel. But pleasant as it is to say such a thing, it has the disadvantage of not being true, for Afghanistan is closed as tight against missionaries as ever, and in spite of the predominant British influence in Baluchistan, there is no missionary work in that territory save at the town of Quetta, where the distribution of the Scriptures is the main item of possible activity. In both Afghanistan and Baluchistan the ancient Mohammedan penalty of death for abandoning the faith of the prophet is still enforced. No care of the resident British consuls is sufficient to avert the stealthy fate that overtakes a Moslem convert to Christianity.—Missionary Review.

A Test of Spirituality

At the Methodist Episcopal Conference held in Cumberland, Md., the first week in April, the Bishop gives a test for the "spiritually fit" which might well be applied to all church membership everywhere. The Baltimore News for April 3 reports as follows:

"There are 300 lay delegates. The laymen are much interested in the appointments, and their arrival has started gossip as to probable changes. Bishop Berry has made it plain that he will not listen to laymen unless they show that they are 'spiritually fit' to give advice. They must answer these questions:

"Do you conduct family worship in your home every day?"

"Are you a regular attendant at the weekly prayer meeting?"

"Are you a subscriber for a weekly paper of the church?"

Current Items of Interest to Friends

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING

Carthage.—The Friends' Missionary Society observed guest day, March 18, at the home of Mrs. Charles S. Winslow. The guests present were the members of the Methodist and Christian Missionary Societies. After the regular business the program was in charge of Florence Macy Parker, Lizzie Hare Binford and Susanna Binford, all returned Friends Missionaries from Mexico. Florence Parker, who wore a Mexican lace gown, gave a very interesting talk on missions in that field, having visited both the M. E. and Christian missions during her stay in Mexico. A number of beautiful and interesting curios were displayed. Mrs. Parker also sang the Mexican National hymn and Esther Parker sang "The Golden Drina." A Mexican menu was provided. In April we are looking forward to a parlor meeting at the home of J. Edgar Williams, and anticipating the presence of Solomon and Amanda Tice, who have so recently returned from the mission field in Mexico.

Muncie.—On last Sabbath evening, the eleventh annual railroad men's meeting was held at the Friends' Church. Charles E. Hiatt, of Marion, a former pastor at Muncie, gave the address. Special Easter music was rendered, and Charles W. Sweet had the closing prayer.

Van Wert, Ohio.—Van Wert Meeting has recently made the every-member canvass. Twenty-two members, men and women, responded to the call for volunteers to conduct the canvass. The next evening they met with the pastor and perfected a thorough organization. The following Sabbath afternoon was set to make the canvass. We had purchased one hundred sets of the duplex envelopes and quite a number of the members thought at first that this was entirely too many, claiming that but very few would take them. Before the committee had completed their work, however, it was found that they were running short. The pastor kindly took some of the regular church envelopes, numbered them, and put them up in packages of twenty-six. (The pledges taken were for balance of church year.) These were placed in the hands of the committee, and soon it was discovered that all these were gone. One of the amusing things in connection with the introduction of this plan was that a number of our very best members declared that not more than half of the membership would take hold of it, but the entire church caught the vision and all responded readily. We are confident that our financial problem is now solved. We expect to make the plan work by sending a notice to every delinquent member the first week in each month.

Class No. 8 of our Bible School that has been organized only about five months, is becoming a strong factor in the church. It now has an enrollment of about seventy. About a month ago the class appointed an "efficiency" committee. This committee is wide awake and is really "doing things." At their last regular monthly business meeting (April 3), more than one hundred and twenty-five were present, the class having invited a number of people who were not members. As a result, five new members were enrolled the following Sunday. At least ten of the class have volunteered to speak to every stranger every Sabbath, so far as possible, for the next three months. The class is doing a great work.

KANSAS YEARLY MEETING

Glen Elder.—Fairview and Glen Elder Monthly Meeting have been especially favored with the presence of A. Gibson and wife of Mt. Ayr, in a three weeks' revival meeting. While we did not see as many results as we had wished, we feel the meeting has been a wonderful uplift to the Church. Brother and sister Gibson won a warm place in the hearts of the people.

Ingersoll, Oklahoma.—The young people of our school and community find much pleasure and benefit in the Christian Endeavor work. Our Endeavorers meet each Thursday evening, with a good attendance. We have thirty-three active members, eight honorary members and only one associate member. Our society won the banner of Alfalfa County at the Christian Endeavor convention held at Cherokee, March 29th. Instead of following the lessons planned in the Christian Endeavor World, we are studying the books of the New Testament and find in each lesson help and encouragement. Our name is "Stella Christian Endeavor."

WESTERN YEARLY MEETING

Kingman, Indiana.—Robert Pelt, of Sheridan, Indiana, who has been engaged in evangelistic work in Western Yearly Meeting during the past winter, led in a meeting at this place during last month. Meetings were held twice a day for over two weeks. The Gospel was proclaimed in its simplicity and directness, but in the love of Christ and the power of the Holy Ghost. The recognition of Christ as God reconciling the world unto Himself by His own blood on the cross and revealed by the Holy Spirit, was shown to be the only cure for sin and unbelief. The baptism with the Holy Ghost and Christ within brings a victorious life and is the power for effective Christian service. Much conviction for sin was upon the people and several received definite blessing in pardon or sanctification for which we are deeply grateful to our Lord and Master. On leaving Kingman, Robert Pelt entered immediately into revival service at Kempton, where Edgar Sims is serving as pastor.

Watseka, Illinois.—One hundred signed the pledge in one day at the Watseka, Illinois, Friends' Church recently. That day was devoted especially to temperance. A chart such as is found in some public schools, showing the effects of alcohol and of cigarettes upon the human body, was used in the Bible School. The pastor, F. J. Cope, discussed the subject from the standpoint of the relation of the physical life. At the evening service, the city attorney spoke on "Alcohol and Crime," giving facts from his legal experience and from the court records of the town and county. The county president of the W. C. T. U., gave a talk on "Cigarettes," urging better enforcement of the state laws concerning cigarettes.

OUTLINE OF STUDY

The Board of Young Friends' Activities of the Five Years Meeting has issued an outline of study for Young Friends. It covers the history and ideals of the Society. Its purpose is "To make the acquaintance of some of the Early Friends; to discover for one's self the reasons for their struggles and their strength; to discover in what Friends differ from other religious bodies, and why; to trace the growth, or failure to grow, of Quakerism to the present day; and to discover the needs and capacities of the Society of Friends in and for the world."

Copies can be had by addressing the Chairman, Willard O. Trueblood, 313 East Thirteenth Street, Indianapolis.

WEST RICHMOND MEETING

On the evening of April 7th, about fifty of the men of the West Richmond, Indiana, meeting, gathered for a conference and supper at the home of Prof. N. C. Heironimus on College Avenue. A splendid supper was served by the Ladies' Aid Society, following which Charles E. Tebbetts presented the interests of the every-member canvass showing what it had accomplished in many other places.

Harrison Scott made a statement showing for what purpose every dollar raised by the meeting the past year, had been expended. For Yearly Meeting stock $231.10 had been raised, and upon the basis of Yearly Meeting expenditures, $11.19 of this had been spent for printing; $48.50 for foreign missions; $38.80 for Church extension; $29.10 for evangelistic and pastoral work; $19.40 for remodeling the Yearly Meeting house; $1.94 for Bible School work; $2.91 for Christian Endeavor; 97 cents for temperance; 49 cents for home missions, etc., through a list of twenty-one items of expense incurred by the Yearly Meeting.

Sixty-two dollars and eight cents had been raised by the meeting for Quarterly Meeting stock, expended as follows: $50.52 for evangelistic and pastoral work; $5.77 for the Peace Committee; $3.62 for the Temperance Committee, and $2.17 for the Bible School Committee.

For current expenses of the local meeting a budget of $1,370.82 was presented, this amount to cover pastor's salary, appropriation to Young People's Christian Society of Earlham, expenditures for social functions, envelopes for the collections and miscellaneous expenses. Judged by the contributions of the past quarter to foreign missions, the meeting will raise this year $307.32. The meeting is composed of 244 members, of which 126 are adults. Of this number, 101 are contributing to the support of the meeting an average of twenty-eight cents per week each. Forty-five of the members are contributing to missions an average of thirteen cents each per week.

It would probably prove helpful if every other meeting of Friends would take the trouble to trace in a similar manner the money which is contributed to the work of the Church.

It was agreed to organize permanently a League or Brotherhood of the men of the congregation. The proposition of a men's conference of the Church was endorsed.

Ask your neighbor to subscribe for THE AMERICAN FRIEND. $1.50 per year.

WEEK-END AT WORCESTER

Worcester, Massachusetts—On March 21 and 22, Eleanor D. Wood and Julia Swift Orvis, of Wellsley College; Elihu Grant, of Smith College; Thomas E. Jones, of Hartford Theological Seminary; Frederick Blanchard, of Lynn, Massachusetts; Frances Wheeler, of Providence, Rhode Island, and Alice Wood, of Winthrop, Maine, visited Worcester Friends' Meeting in the interest of a larger and more united Quaker fellowship. These Friends made it known that they wished to come and the Monthly Meeting extended to them an invitation.

The meeting on March 21 took on the nature of a conference, the subject being, "What can Quakerism do for this age?" The meeting for worship on the 22, was unusually interesting and edifying. The evening hour was similar to the earlier occasion, the subject being, "A Stronger Society of Friends."

The emphasis at both of these conferences, led by Eleanor D. Wood, centered around the subject of worship. The discussions were terse and several different views were given, but all in a broad sympathetic spirit. Wilbur K. Thomas closed the discussions, he and a member of his congregation having come from Boston after their morning meeting. His message was timely and inspiring. Worcester Friends appreciated the self sacrifice which made this occasion possible and believe that it was a decided success.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR

April 26.

Topic.—Our Tongue for Christ. Exodus 4: 10-16. (Led by the Prayer Meeting Committee.)

Out of the heart the mouth will always speak. If the heart is tuned to the music of heaven, the tongue is bound to sing it.

Care should be taken to guard the citadel of the lips, by guarding the citadel of the heart, else the tongue will prove to be that unruly member described in James.

Memorize texts of Scripture, and these will set many a tongue going at the prayer meeting, which otherwise would be silent.

Meditate upon the goodness of God, and the tongue will repeat the lessons that have rejoiced the heart.

Commune with the Father in secret, earnest prayer, and the tongue will be ready to tell of the joy and the up-lift that has come through communing.

"Ye shall be witnesses," not silent witnesses, but witnesses ready to proclaim throughout the community the blessings which have been received from the Father's hands.

Guard the tongue against evil speaking, against selfish utterances, against idle talk, against sinful speech.

Train it to speak kindly, helpfully, winningly for the Master.

WANTED—The name and address of every Friend coming to Chicago. Report for yourself or friends to Herman Newman, 1817 Republic building. Meeting for worship, 4413 Indiana Ave., First-day, 11 a. m.

BIBLE SCHOOL LESSON

April 26.

Subject.—The Lost Sheep and the Lost Coin.

Lesson.—Luke 15: 1-10.

Golden Text.—There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth. Luke 15: 10.

Time.—January A.D. 30.

Place.—In Perea.

A week ago we had a lesson that seemed to make it hard to become a Christian,—hard for those who were unrepentant and who were following Jesus through curiosity or hope of earthly promotion. Today we learn how easy it is to become a Christian,—easy for those who know they are lost and are ready to be found, ready to be repentant.

This lesson rebukes the ecclesiastic class spirit. How easy it is to feel that religion is only meant for "our set," or at most that our efforts to win men and women to Christ must be confined to our particular set! How often the Church extends its welcome only to those who are "socially fit!" All too often the common man, especially the laborer, feels that the Church has no welcome for him.

Herein is a problem that is too serious to be ignored. Christ came not to call the righteous, but sinners, to repentance. He is after the lost ones of earth. But the Church is His representative. The Pharisees murmured that he received the despised tax gatherers and the outcasts. To the Pharisees, these were beyond the pale of religious consideration.

But Jesus tells a story in the form of a parable that forever must determine the status of the Church in its attitude toward the lost sinner. The Church is the shepherd as Christ's representative. If there be a lost one, it is not enough to open the door; it is not enough to be sympathetic; it is not enough to write a check for the care of the lost one. The Church must go after that which is lost until it is found.

That is the Christian attitude toward the outcast, toward every sinner. It is not enough for the sheep to know that the Shepherd wants it to come back. The sheep is lost and does not know the way back to the fold. The shepherd must go and bring it back. The Church must become all things to all men, as Paul said, that by all means it may save some.

If men will not come to hear the Gospel, the Gospel must be carried to them; into every dark corner of earth, into the slums, into the homes of poverty, into the haunts of vice, into the tenement districts, into the foreign quarter, into the neglected territory, into Wall street, into the miser's home, into fashionable society, into the world everywhere, until all men and women know that Christ's Gospel is the standard by which all lives are to be measured.

It means sacrifice to become a true shepherd for Christ.

Have you looked for sheep in the desert, For those who have missed their way? Have you been in the wild waste places, Where the lost and the wandering stray?

Have you trodden the lonely highway? The foul and darksome street? It may be you'd see in the gloaming The print of my wounded feet.

Then comes the joy of finding the lost. This is compensation for every sacrifice. There is joy in the search, but there is greater joy in the finding. If the Church would put its personality into its gospel activity, as the shepherd does in his leadership and care of the flock, the rejoicings over the return of the lost would be multiplied many fold.

Died

Albertson.—Anna J. Albertson, wife of J. C. Albertson, was born near Raysville, Indiana, January 6, 1854, and died at her home in Lynn, Indiana, February 9, 1914. She accepted Christ as her Savior before she reached maturity, and often gave public testimony of His ability and willingness to help in every time of need. While an invalid for nine years, the Heavenly Father mercifully spared her from severe suffering.

Binford.—Jared P. Binford, long a minister of the gospel, died at Carthage, Indiana, April 1, 1914, in his eightieth year. Emily L. Binford, his wife, and in an eminent degree a helpmeet with him, died the preceding week, March 24. To speak of one is to speak of both, in such perfect accord was their union and in such sympathy were they in all Christian work.

Burris.—Susan Burris, daughter of Edward and Elizabeth Bray, was born in Hamilton County, Indiana, August 13, 1836, and died near Arcadia, Indiana, March 21, 1914, aged 77 years 7 months and 8 days. She was a birthright Friend and was a charter member of Hinckle's Creek Monthly Meeting. She was a regular attendee at meeting. She married Pleasant Burris in 1861. Many times during her illness she expressed a desire to go and gave the assurance that she was ready. Four children and fifteen grandchildren survive her.

Doherty.—Henry Doherty died at his home near Fairmount, Indiana, February 23, 1914, aged 51 years and 4 months. For over twenty years he had been an earnest Christian, and had an intense interest in all church activities. He was always doing something for others and suggesting some good to all with whom he came in contact. The Bible Class of which he was a member, and the students of Fairmount Academy attended in a body. Funeral services were conducted by Charles Sweet, of Muncie.

Kendall.—Enos Kendall was born near Richmond, Indiana, October 22, 1835, and died at the home of his daughter, Thorntown, Indiana, March 23, 1914, after a lingering illness due to creeping paralysis, aged 78 years and 5 months. At the age of nineteen, after months of fasting and seclusion he was converted in the harvest field. He worked for his board in Earlham Boarding School for one year and taught for seven years following. He served as local minister to Walnut Grove Meeting in Thorntown quarter for over forty years. A short time before his death he wrote these words in closing a history of his life: "I realize that my time is short to work in my Master's vineyard and that I may not be able much longer to use my pen and hand in his service, but to my God alone belongs all praise for He found me when I was lost, He has led me about and taught me and I trust will present me faultless before His throne."

Kenworthy.—Daniel Kenworthy was born near West Elkton, Ohio, February 26, 1831, and died at the same place March 24, 1914, aged 83 years and 28 days. Death came as a result of apoplexy, he having been in failing health for a number of years. He was a birthright Friend.

Laurence.—Alleta B. W. Laurence, wife of Charles W. Laurence, of New York City, met with a fatal accident in the subway of that city, March 23, 1914. While she retained her membership at the First Presbyterian Church of Poughkeepsie, New York, she was one of the most active and efficient workers with

UPWARD START

After Changing from Coffee to Postum

Many a talented person is kept back because of the interference of coffee with the nourishment of the body.

This is especially so with those whose nerves are very sensitive, as is often the case with talented persons. There is a simple, easy way to get rid of coffee troubles and a Tenn. lady's experience along these lines is worth considering. She says:

"Almost from the beginning of the use of coffee it hurt my stomach. By the time I was fifteen I was almost a nervous wreck, nerves all unstrung, no strength to endure the most trivial thing, either work or fun.

"There was scarcely anything I could eat that would agree with me. The little I did eat seemed to give me more trouble than it was worth. I was literally starving; was so weak I could not sit up long at a time.

"It was then a friend brought me a hot cup of Postum. I drank part of it and after an hour I felt as though I had had something to eat—felt strengthened. That was about five years ago, and after continuing Postum in place of coffee and gradually getting stronger, today I can eat and digest anything I want, walk as much as I want. My nerves are steady.

"I believe the first thing that did me any good and gave me an upward start, was Postum, and I use it altogether now instead of coffee."

Name given by the Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum now comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

She was President of the Prospect Hill Girls' Club and prominent in other similar organizations. Six ministers of the Society of Friends took part in the brief funeral service.

Moore.—John F. Moore, son of Jacob and Tacy Moore, died at his home in Richmond, Indiana, March 9, 1914, aged seventy-six years and eleven months. He was a life-long member of Friends, being a member of East Main Street Meeting at the time of his death. He was held in very high esteem. He leaves two sons and a daughter.

Trueblood.—Francis Trueblood, son of Jehu and Louisa Trueblood, of Blue River Salem, Indiana, died at his home at Bradentown, Florida, March 27, 1914, aged seventy-three years. For several years he lived at Archer, Florida, where he assisted in establishing a Friends' Monthly Meeting belonging to Whitewater Quarterly Meeting in Indiana. After the severe freeze twenty years ago the members were scattered, the meeting was laid down and his membership was transferred to Whitewater Monthly Meeting, Richmond, Indiana. He was best known for his work along temperance lines and in missions. For several years he had paid all the salary of a native missionary in China. He has been affiliated with the Methodist Church and Sunday School at Bradentown. He was a brother of Professor E. P. Trueblood, of Earlham College. The widow and three children survive him.

The Refiner's Fire

He sat by a furnace of sevenfold heat,
As He watched by the precious ore,
And closer He bent with a searching gaze
As He heated it more and more.

He knew He had ore that could stand the test,
And He wanted the finest gold
To mould as a crown for the King to wear,
Set with gems of a price untold.

So He laid our gold in the burning fire,
'Tho' we fain would have said Him "nay,"
And He watched the dross that we had not seen,
As it melted and passed away.

And the gold grew brighter and yet more bright,
But our eyes were so dim with tears,
We saw but the fire—not the Master's hand,
And questioned with anxious fears.

Yet our gold shone out with a richer glow,
As it mirrored a Form above
That bent o'er the fire, tho' unseen by us,
With looks of ineffable love.

Can we think that it pleases His loving heart,
To cause us a moment's pain?
Ah, no! but He saw thro' the present cross
The bliss of eternal gain.

So He waited there with a watchful eye,
With a love that is strong and sure,
And His gold did not suffer a whit more heat
Than was needed to make it pure.

Parable of the King's Household

Suggested by the tragic death of Arletta B. W. Laurence, March 23, 1914.

The Daughters of the King were all busy spinning in the sunshine.

Suddenly a thread snapped, and one arose, dropped her distaff and passed out.

Mute questionings as to what it meant, were answered softly, "Her Father, the King, called for her and she instantly obeyed."

The others continued at their appointed tasks.

How sweet amid the toil and the strife
To hear our Father calling "Enter into life."
To bid farewell to every care and fear
And close beside the King stand ever near.

The dear ones left behind amid the gloom
Know but the sadness and the tomb.
But to the ransomed soul the glad release
The thrilling glory, the eternal peace.

To suffer, then to enter in
Free from all trace of stain or sin.
Death is a victory, a cause to praise, to sing
It is the glad home-going of a daughter of the KING.

The First Friends Marriage in British Columbia

It was my privilege to be present this morning at the first Friends' marriage in British Columbia. We were just in time, almost to the minute. There was a wait, however, of about twenty-five minutes for the bride. One could see that some were profiting by the opportunity to engage in silent prayer. After awhile a voice from the door announced that "something was wrong with the taxi" but that the bridal party would be along in a few minutes. There was a moment's relaxation while friends smiled at the general unreliability of taxis.

The bride entered. Gowned in a simple dress of white china silk (which her father had recently brought from China, not made up) and with the conventional veil and a small spray of orange blossoms fastening, she made a lovely picture.

Following a short silence the groom stood up and said: "In the presence of God, and before these witnesses, I, Llewellyn Arthur Hinder, take thee, Ruth Mary Clark, to be my wife, and with His divine assistance promise to be unto thee a faithful and loving husband as long as we both shall live."

The bride then arose and said the same form of words, with the necessary substitution of the word "husband" for "wife," etc. A woman came forward and placed a bunch of white carnations in her hands. The meeting being open, Henry Clark was led to offer a short prayer. An impressive address was then given by James Cass. This was followed by a reading from Eph. 5: 22, 23. Another prayer and address were given.

The house was decorated with beautiful cut flowers, and a pot of shamrocks held a rather conspicuous place, one of the members having thought of the fact that it was St. Patrick's Day. About one hundred people were present. Several strangers remarked on the beauty of the ceremony. The reporter of the principal newspaper of Victoria was particularly impressed. The wedding cake, made by the bride's mother, was cut and distributed (with tea and coffee), from a beautifully garnished table in an ante-room.

Many kind and loving words were spoken to the young couple personally after the wedding, some tearfully. May God prosper them and keep them witnessing for Him.

JOSEPHINE WOODARD.

The Personality of Jesus

The Christian religion centers in the personality of Jesus Christ. No system of ethics, no system of theology even, no system of Christian philanthropy is important that does not find its inspiration and authority in the personality of Jesus. No critical analysis, no doctrine of philosophy can ever efface or obscure the power and influence of this personality. "Apart from me ye can do nothing."

Whether it is Jesus teaching by the seaside, or feeding the multitudes, or opening the eyes of the blind, or laying bare the sins of the Pharisees, or thrilling the multitudes by the utterance of those mighty truths that overturned the moral standards of that age, all alike reveal the Divine personality, without which they would have been forgotten long ago.

The world's history was changed in that first century, and civilization has trended upward to this very hour. What influence was it that marked this turning point in human events? Jesus was a great teacher. Yes. He possessed striking originality of expression. Yes. He became a leader of men. Yes. He proclaimed against age-long customs and set up new standards of faith and conduct for the world. Yes. All this He did and more, but neither singly nor collectively did these qualifications render Him the great world figure of all human history. Not even the fact that He was the author of a new gospel, the proponent of a strange but impelling system of religion that regarded all men in a common brotherhood, was sufficient, of itself, to give Jesus of Nazareth the place in history which He has maintained for nearly two thousand years.

Here was a man who never led an army, never governed a people, never wrote a book, never was a social leader. On the contrary, He became despised by His own people, hated by the religious rulers, was persecuted and finally crucified, yet today He sways the world as has no other personage that ever lived. Wherein lies the secret of His power? History will not write the record correctly that ignores the power and domination of His Divine personality. Within a few weeks after the rulers thought an end had been put to this meddlesome man, we find three thousand men and women joining His cause. Amid persecution his followers multiplied. His missionaries journeyed to other lands and His teachings gained adherents among the aliens who had been taught that Jehovah worship was not intended for them. Today the truth of this new gospel has honeycombed the globe, and every other religious system is threatened by its presence.

Jesus had within Him the lasting elements of a personality that was fitted for the needs of all the ages. It was a personality that had the power to inspire both intensive and extensive growth among His followers. While growing in numbers, they deepened and broadened in the spiritual life, seeking ever to pattern after the matchless example of Jesus who was put to death, but who is alive forevermore.

The personality of Jesus is no less potential for the salvation of this age than for the opening years of that first century. Indeed the world understands better today than it did then that the Presence of this Holy Savior is in the world ready to reveal Himself by the power of the Spirit to all mankind in every age. It is the business of the Church to reveal Him as the same sympathetic, loving, companionable Jesus that He was when He walked through Galilee. The world needs to find Jesus, and when they have found Him they will find a Personage, whom to know is salvation.

The Christian world may learn many lessons from the life of Jesus, but one of the greatest it can learn is that the Christian faith needs to be exemplified in strong personalities that will command attention and win disciples for our Lord by the power of their religious life, by their ability to personate Christ in their own daily activities.

Repealing Tolls Exemption

Friends generally will probably stand by the effort of the administration at Washington to secure the repeal of the Panama Canal tolls exemption law. Wholly aside from any economic or even political issue involved, it is evident that the law passed by the last Congress granting free tolls to American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade probably contravenes important treaty provisions.

Such an act might easily lead to international complications. Besides, a question of national honesty and integrity is raised, beside which any suggestion of eco-conomic profit is of minor significance. Certain newspapers with a suspicion of the jingo spirit are now trying to foment trouble and are appealing to our national pride to avert what they term is a national humiliation.

But if national honor be at stake in the granting of free tolls contrary to treaty stipulations, it is the part of honor and not of dishonor to recede from our position. When all the other nations are practically a unit in saying we have taken a wrong step and a large element of our own thinking people hold to the same opinion, it is the part of wisdom to correct the error before we get into a position nationally from which we can not extricate ourselves without trouble.

The Spirit and Importance of the English Tramp

BY THOMAS E. JONES

In order to understand the spirit and importance of an English Tramp it will be well to consider first how it originated; its essential characteristics; its spiritual significance; and its possible importance to the Society of Friends.

The genesis of the Tramp seems to have been about fifty or sixty years ago. At that time Friends meetings were suffering from a spirit of quietism. It was evident that something vital had to happen if the Society were to remain an important religious body. Joseph Sturge, of Birmingham, became impressed at that time with the deplorable ignorance and low ideals of the working classes of England. He tried to remedy this by establishing the Friends First-day Schools. This soon developed into the Adult School movement and spread rapidly over the whole of England. Friends found that once more they had a vital message for the world. Young Friends now took new interest in the Society, because there was something for them to do. At once these Friends became proud of the Quaker heritage and told others about it. New members began to come in and with them new enthusiasm.

Another factor that added to this was the result of a conference held in Manchester in 1895. This conference met to prevent a division of the Society over modern views of the Bible. Sentiment was quite strongly divided at the beginning of the meeting, but Friends gave vent to their opinions and found common ground upon which they could agree. This Manchester conference was considered such a success that it was believed wise to hold another meeting where Friends could come in contact with the most recent views regarding science and religion. Thus arose the Summer schools, a series of which were held in 1897. These had such an influence on both young and old that it became evident some sort of permanent institution should be established which would meet the social need and at the same time furnish religious training. This need was remedied by establishing Woodbrooke.

In 1905 the first Yearly Meeting out of London met at Leeds. This breaking of an old precedent gave renewed interest to the Society as a whole and also caused Young Friends in this section to keep up the deep spirit of the Yearly Meeting, by holding special group meetings. Soon after this occurred the death of John Wilhelm Rowntree who was a great leader in these new movements. Such a paralyzing loss and the sense of a work unaccomplished seemed to be a brand that set off all the accumulated enthusiasm. Consequently in the autumn of 1905 some sixty Friends gathered and actually tramped about the country. They went in small groups holding missions, or attending meetings where they tried to help in what way they could. They returned to camp each evening to compare experiences and gain strength from fellowship.

In the summer of 1906 a group of young Friends in Gloucester decided to hold a tramp of their own, and in the following summer a Tramp was held between Birmingham and Gloucester at Evesham. Here it was felt that there should be a combination of educational and inspirational lectures which were introduced in connection with the devotional side of the Tramp. After this there was one Tramp each summer until 1910, when two Tramps were held with the double purpose of developing meetings and helping young people. The idea was conceived during this summer of drawing all the Tramps into one conference held at Woodbrooke. This was done with great success and a continuation committee was appointed to visit Friends in all centers of any size, holding meetings and week-end conferences. In 1911 the great conference of young Friends met in Swanwick. There were about four hundred present, coming from all parts of England. This meeting was such a success that there could be no further question about the Young People's Movement having power to do great things for the Society. The next question was, how could this power be manifested most effectively? The answer came through the Tramp. This has been the special mode of activity since, and great good has been accomplished by it.

The English Tramp takes three forms, which we may call the Progressive Tramp, the Local or Quarterly Meeting Tramp, and the Annual Yearly Meeting Tramp. Those taking part in a Progressive Tramp, tour a district. Marian Armitage, secretary of the church extension work of Nottingham Quarterly Meeting arranged one of this kind last summer. The purpose of the Tramp was to revive small meetings in the towns and cities throughout Derby, Lincoln, and Nottinghamshires. The itinerary covered a week. The places for meeting averaged about twenty miles apart. Cycling this distance gave us just the proper amount of physical exercise and put us in shape for our best work. You can imagine how inspiring a tour of one hundred and fifty miles through these three beautiful counties of England must have been. I think I have never met more cordial people than we came in contact with on this trip.

The second Tramp to notice is the Local or Quarterly Meeting Tramp. One of these was held in Wensley Dale in Northern Yorkshire during the latter part of last summer. This Tramp was arranged by some Askrigg Friends. Its purpose was to revive a few small meetings located in the rural communities or villages of this district. About fifteen Trampers met here and most of them came from sections nearby. However, American Quakerism was represented by Wilbur Thomas of Boston and myself. All of us stayed together like one large family, spending the forenoons in meditation and discussion and the afternoons in visiting meetings. We traveled together, held our meetings in one group, cheered our friends and moved on.

But most interesting of all perhaps is the Annual Yearly Meeting Tramp. I call it a Yearly Meeting Tramp, because it is planned by the Young Friends sub-committee of the Home Missions and Extension Committee of the Yearly Meeting, and because it is attended by people from all parts of England and Ireland. Last summer this Tramp was held at Challock near Ashford in Kentshire, at the summer home of Herbert Headley. Mr. and Mrs. Headley opened their home to us in true English style, giving us full use of their beautiful country residence. Mr. Headley had done much to make the place comfortable. With a few nails, some paint, and much hard work he had changed two railway carriages into sleeping apartments for the ladies, while the men had full use of the barn. There were between fifty and sixty present and I assure you we had many jolly times. It was great fun to help as table waiter, dish washer, or "water hauler." Each person had his turn at orderly duty which he usually hailed with enthusiasm, because he always had at least a dozen colleagues with whom to make merry. Then, the barn was the scene of many pillow battles, sleeping-bunk piracies, and joke contests. The melee usually lasted an hour after time to retire. After this each became thoughtful enough or sleepy enough, perhaps both, to quietly drop off into slumber and leave his brother to his dreams. (Another most enjoyable feature of the Tramp was that of the bicycle trips.) On our way to hold meetings we often discussed the peculiarities of our different bodies, trying thereby to discover what suggestions each had for the other as well as fix our own ideas.

(TO BE CONCLUDED)

"If we forget that our chief business is to do the works of Him that sent us, we shall lose the mightiest impulse to right living. God is on the field, and we are under His care as well as subject to His authority; therefore we need not fear to go straight on in the path of duty."—Christian Advocate.

Resurrection of Lazarus *

BY JUDGE FRANCIS J. LAMB

We offer in evidence the Gospel of John as an Ancient Document, especially parts thereof relevant to the "issue," viz., as particular, subsidiary, evidentiary facts, and cite the verse or verses in which the fact is recorded.

FACTS

Lazarus was a man residing at Bethany, a village situated about fifteen furlongs from Jerusalem (John xi. 18). Mary and Martha were sisters of Lazarus, and the three were beloved by Jesus (John xi. 5, 21, 32). Lazarus was sick, and his malady became so serious that his sisters became alarmed. Evidently hoping that Jesus would cure Lazarus, the sisters sent a message to Jesus, who was absent (John xi. 3, 21, 23).

Jesus received the message, and, after receiving it, stayed two days in the place where he received it; during which time Lazarus died (John xi. 6). Jesus then informed the disciples that accompanied him that Lazarus was dead (John xi. 14). Jesus announced to his disciples his determination to return again to Judæa, where the home of Lazarus had been (John xi. 7, 15).

Jesus and his disciples returned to Bethany, and found that the dead body of Lazarus had been buried and lain in the tomb four days (John xi. 17). When Jesus arrived at Bethany he found many of the Jews attendant at the home of Mary and Martha, met to mourn with the sisters over the death of Lazarus (John xi. 19, 31). The sisters, Mary and Martha, each met Jesus on His arrival at Bethany, and each said to Jesus, "Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died" (John xi. 21, 32). Jesus told Martha that Lazarus should rise again from death, which Martha said she believed would occur "in the resurrection at the last day" (John xi. 23, 24).

The grief of Mary over the death of Lazarus, and that of the Jews also weeping with her, was manifested with such intensity that Jesus, sympathizing, wept also (John xi. 35). At Jesus' request, Mary and Martha and the friends in their company conducted Jesus and his disciples to the tomb, in which lay the dead body of Lazarus. "It was a cave, and a stone lay against it" (John xi. 38, Am. Rev.).

The document shows that, besides Jesus and his disciples and Mary and Martha, there was a considerable concourse of Jews met to sympathize with Mary and Martha over the death of Lazarus (John xi. 19). In the presence of this considerable assembly, immediately at the door of the tomb in which the dead body of Lazarus lay enshrouded in grave-clothes, Jesus ordered the stone to be taken away. "Martha, the sister of him that was dead," protested against opening the tomb. She said to Jesus, "Lord, by this time the body decayeth; for he hath been dead four days (John xi. 39, Am. Rev.).

* Quoted in the March number of the Bible Champion, from "Miracle and Science," and republished by request of a prominent Friend.

In obedience, however, to Jesus' command, those present removed the stone from the door of the tomb (John xi. 41). Then, after brief prayer, Jesus at the door of the tomb spoke with a loud voice, "Lazarus, come forth." Immediately "he that was dead came forth, bound hand and foot with grave-clothes; and his face was bound about with a napkin," and Jesus said, "Loose him, and let him go" (John xi. 43, 44).

Between one and two months later Jesus came again to Bethany, "where Lazarus was whom Jesus raised from the dead," and a feast was spread for Jesus, and "Lazarus was one of them that sat at meat" (John xii. 1, 2). At that time "the common people therefore of the Jews learned that he was there; and they came, not for Jesus' sake only, but that they might see Lazarus also, whom he had raised from the dead" (John xii. 9, Am. Rev.).

The chief priests, hostile to Jesus, when informed of the raising of Lazarus from death, took counsel to put Lazarus to death, because many Jews were led to believe on Jesus by reason of his raising Lazarus from death (John xii. 10, 11).

A few days later, when the Lord made triumphant entry into Jerusalem and the attention of the vast assembly of people at the great feast had been called to the fact of raising Lazarus from death, "the multitude that was with him (Jesus) when he called Lazarus out of the tomb, and raised him from the dead, bear witness"; that is, that multitude that was present when Lazarus was raised from death, testified to the verity of the miracle to the people gathered at Jerusalem (John xii. 17). "For this cause also the multitude went and met him, for that they heard that he had done this sign" (John xii. 18).

All these separate items, evidentiary facts, are ordinary testimony. Mary and Martha were perfectly competent witnesses to know and to testify to the sickness, death, and burial of Lazarus, and that he had been dead and buried four days before Jesus had the tomb opened. The neighbors of Mary and Martha were also competent witnesses to know and testify to the death and sepulture of Lazarus. All of them, and John who wrote the document, were competent to observe and testify to the transactions detailed that took place at the tomb when Lazarus came forth from it alive, and that he continued alive.

Each and all the items of evidence are of matters plain and simple in their nature, easily seen, and capable of being readily and accurately observed, scrutinized, comprehended, and detailed in testimony by witnesses who are of ordinary capacity and observation. The amount of competent evidence is abundant, unimpeached, and uncontradicted.

RESULT OF TRIAL

The evidence would require, at the hands of a jury, a verdict embodying these facts: (1) That Lazarus was dead; (2) that Jesus spoke over the dead body of Lazarus the words, "Lazarus, come forth," and immediately Lazarus' dead body was alive; and (3) that Lazarus came forth from the tomb alive, and continued alive.

A juror would violate his oath if he refused to find such a verdict on that evidence. A contrary verdict would be set aside by a court as not only contrary to the evidence, but perverse. In short, the miracle is proved by competent evidence. The fact that Lazarus was dead and at the fiat words of Jesus he was immediately alive and continued alive, establishes the transaction a miracle as tested by any standard definition; and the proof is by human testimony.

Nay, the facts proved constitute the transaction a miracle, tested even by Mr. Hume's own definition embraced in his proposition here in issue, ii e., "A miracle is a violation of the laws of nature." The word "violation" so used seems plainly polemic, but cannot rationally mean other than that a miracle thwarts or frustrates the operation of the laws of nature.

It is undoubtedly the law of nature that the dead body of a man remain dead. It at once commences to decompose, continues to decompose, and returns to dust. But Lazarus' dead body did not remain dead, did not return to dust, but became alive and continued alive. These facts, thwarting, frustrating, the operation of the laws of nature, were clearly and abundantly proved by a multitude of competent witnesses—by human testimony. Tested even by Mr. Hume's own definition, the transaction was proved a miracle, and is proved a verity, and the proof is by human testimony.

This review of the law and evidence on the "issue" tried justifies the conclusion that the miracles of the Bible are capable of being proved and are proved, by existing available evidence—evidence competent, proper, admissible under the rules and standards of the science of jurisprudence as administered in courts of justice of enlightened nations of the earth; also the miracles of the Bible are verities tested by the same standards by which fact and truth are established on all questions between man and man in which fact and truth depend on and are ascertained and are established through evidence.

Teachers' Training Classes

The great problem before every school is the problem of securing good teachers. Our public schools secure a good corps of teachers by teaching the teachers to teach. The Sabbath school should do the same thing—some are doing it. Is your school doing it? If not, why not?

One man paraphrases Shakespeare's words thus: "Some are born to teach; some have teaching thrust upon them; but most teachers achieve teaching." If your teachers of the present and future have "teaching thrust upon them," an inefficient teaching of God's Word must result; hence the need of trained teachers in your school.—Methodist Recorder.

"Every Christian is at least a minor missionary. Example preaches more powerfully than words; intercession converts as mightily as sermons; alms supply the sinews of that war whose weapons are not carnal."—Christian Work.

The Study of the Bible

BY CHARLES ALEXANDER MOTT

We are now approaching a subject of supreme importance; for the Bible is a book which vitally concerns every person. Without it we would be groping our way in darkness, vainly striving to know of God and to learn of a remedy for this sinful life. We would go down to our graves vainly seeking to pierce the darkness of the future, and sink beneath the sod with nothing but human speculations upon which to rely, hopeless, helpless, a huge question mark staring us in the face. But thanks to God, His Words lift the veil, showing forth the highest morality, teaching the way of a holy life, disclosing a glorious, everlasting eternity for the righteous. Where mortal view cannot penetrate, and where mortal mind is insufficient, the Bible freely discloses precious truths. We behold a sinner and this Book tells how he may become a saint; we behold a cursed world and it tells us that it is to be made a Paradise; we behold the works of God and it tells us of God Himself. Wonderful in its truths; pre-eminent in its instructions for this life; radiant with its grand old doctrines; wondrous as it opens the future life, it is in truth the very Word of God. Beautiful and yet awful, marvelous but still simple, it stands predominant, the Book of books.

Since it is the Word of God, we must approach it with reverence. No other Word has the Father given to us, so we must study this one with due respect and attention. It is all-sufficient, being most profound, extensive and illuminating. It contains all wisdom and all truth. It has withstood the onslaughts of the enemy for centuries, and is withstanding them today—a triumphant victor. It has furnished convictions for men of all ages. For its truths men have died, and men have lived. Today it is revered by thousands. Today it is demanding a most reverent study of its pages to discover its most eloquent truths.

Whether we study history or science, mathematics or art, we must perform our task with diligence. Then in opening the leaves of the Book of books how much greater diligence is demanded! Here we are facing great moral and religious truths. Here we are coming into contact with the doctrines of the Bible which are fraught with the wisdom and the love of God. Here we are finding wonderful prophecies which tell us of the great events of yesterday, having been exactly and precisely fulfilled; they tell us of today with its democratic institutions, the scattering of the Jews and great tendencies of our own time; they tell us of tomorrow; they reach even unto the end of time and forever. Here we find ourselves studying the life and death of Him who is God and Man, who enacted that awful scene on Calvary for the obliteration of sin; who is the embodiment of truth and light, purity and righteousness. Surely we must study these great and fundamental facts with all diligence.

Again, there must be a system to our study. Haphazard reading may be justifiable for pleasure, and some profit may be derived, but this is not study in the true sense of the word. To delve into the great mysteries of truth; to drink freely of the fountains of living water, we must have order and system. The Bible may be studied consecutively, picking out the historical and biographical, the spiritual, the typical and prophetic; or topically, taking some great line of truth and following it through the Bible as it develops and unfolds itself.

But you cannot perform this task of yourself. You must have a Guide, even the Holy Spirit. You must breathe some of the fire which surged in the hearts of the writers. You must have and feel the Holy Spirit as they did, and then only can you fully understand and appreciate the words which describe the feelings which actuated them as they were possessed of the Holy Spirit. As He moves and guides in your own bosom, as you do not allow prejudice or anything to turn you aside, you will be led into all truth, and the Holy Spirit will reveal the mysteries of God.

The Bible is above all a spiritual Book, and it will speak to you with new truths. New visions will burst upon your spiritual horizon, new flashes of light will burn their way into your inmost soul. You must apply these to your own personal life; you must live as the Bible teaches, or it will become a sealed book. I repeat it, it will become a sealed book. "When it speaks, I will obey," must be the determination of the reader."

Let us then study the Bible reverently, diligently, systematically, with the Holy Spirit ever guiding, with our hearts ever open to the truth; bound to explore its marvelous secrets, to discover its precious diamonds, to know its eternal truths; determined to partake of this God-given message. Then as we reach the highest summit of this life, we will look back over time unwasted, and rejoice in the victories of truth.

Friends' Work in England

BY LEANAH HOBSON

American Friends may not readily understand how English Friends have increased in numbers during the last five years, when we have been led to understand they have no pastors. It is necessary that some explanation be made. In many of their meetings they have what they call a Home Missionary, whom they support just as our American pastors are supported and whose duty is practically the same as that of the pastors in this country. The difference is mostly in the name.

Meetings that had been discontinued have been revived by this method and are prospering. They do not have as many young ministers and workers coming into the work according to their numbers as we have. In England the morning meetings for worship have more silence than do ours in this country. There is little or no singing in the morning services. There is plenty of singing with the organ, however, in the evening meetings. There is much dissatisfaction in England on account of the discontinuance of their meetings for Ministry and Oversight. Most Friends believe that nothing can take their place.

A Monthly Meeting Chronicle

(Wherein is told the story of a Monthly Meeting which caught a vision, and with some misgivings decided to improve an opportunity.)

BY JUNIUS JUNIOR

(CONCLUDED)

XV.

The month of March, 1914, had come. There was a note of spring in the air, and in harmony with nature the energy of a new religious life was pulsating in the veins of Slow Valley Monthly Meeting. The spirit of worship was upon the congregation and a holy hush stilled every heart before the Lord. Jehovah was speaking to His people and in the silence came the feeling of power that energized their faith into an element of strength, making them courageous for any task.

The resident minister broke the stillness in a prayer that seemed to vocalize the sentiment and aspirations of all the gathered company, while the pastor brought a wonderful message on the "Victory of Faith." In simple but direct words he portrayed the influence of the consecrated life upon the community and the relationship of the Church of Christ to the problems of humanity everywhere.

The delegates to the Quarterly Meeting reported a time of unusual blessing. Progress in the work of the two country Bible Schools was recited, and announcement was made that that on the first Sabbath in April a Junior C. E. Society would be organized under the care of one of the active C. E. young ladies. The class of neglected children had increased to twenty-six, and through the influence of its work, calls were coming for a Bible School in a quarter of the city adjoining the foreign settlement.

The committee appointed to solicit funds for the meeting's share of the expenses of a city missionary, to have charge of the joint mission work among the foreigners, reported that $420.00 had been secured, payable in quarterly installments, and the members of the joint committee were encouraged to use their influence in securing a capable woman for this important work among the aliens of the city. This subject provoked considerable discussion which revealed the extent to which this subject had taken hold of the thought of Slow Valley Meeting. It was evident that outside of the little mission, no effort was being made to touch either the social or religious life of this increasing colony, who for the most part had emigrated from Southern Europe. Yet many of these were now citizens of the state ready to assume the responsibility of suffrage, while their children mingled with others in the common schools as an educative force in the common melting pot of the child life of Newtown. Besides, it was felt that these aliens needed the gospel for their own sakes.

The merchant expressed the belief that the selection of some city missionary was the only immediately available remedy for the situation, but he had the hope that inside of a year or two some converted foreigner might be found with the missionary spirit upon him, who could take charge of the whole foreign problem in the city. The matter was left with the joint committee to work out as best it could, with the assurance that Slow Valley Meeting would contribute its means and its hearty co-operation in every practical way to help in Christianizing these people who in a sense had become wards of the community.

A joint report was presented from the two central committees appointed at the February session to have general oversight of all the work of the meeting, and the names of persons to constitute the sub-committees were read. There were numerous expressions of appreciation of the work of the two committees in naming persons who were so evidently suited to the particular tasks assigned them. It was noted that only four persons had been assigned to service upon more than one committee, and these only had two assignments each. This was in such marked contrast to the usual custom as to call forth comment and hearty commendation. The report indicated the following adjustment and assignment of sub-departments:

The committees to have care of what the meeting was doing for itself: 1. Pastoral Committee. 2. Financial Committee. 3. Bible School. 4. Christian Endeavor. 5. Education. 6. Visitation and Personal Workers. 7. Building and Grounds. 8. Ushers. 9. The Needy Poor of the Congregation.

The committees to have care of work for others: 1. Evangelistic. 2. Foreign Missions. 3. Social Service. 4. Joint work among the foreigners. 5. Charity Committee. 6. Temperance. 7. Peace. 8. General Federation Work. 9. Invitation and Welcome to Others. 10. New Fields of Work.

It was explained that in cases where the work of departments seemed to overlap, there should be a conference of the committees concerned, and co-operation to the extent that their interests were common. It was further recommended that apart from this form of organization there be a Ladies' Aid Society organized and also a brotherhood of the men of the Church. This was agreed to and the Social Committee was instructed to see that efforts were made to form both organizations.

A favorable report having been given by the Investigation Committee, the nineteen new applicants for membership were received and these were added to the Church rolls. Applications for fourteen others were presented, and certificates were received and read for a family of five which had recently come from another state. Letters were read for four others whose rights of membership were transferred from two of the other city churches.

The question of foreign missions was brought forcibly to the attention of the meeting, and the proposition was made that the meeting assume responsibility for the salary of a missionary in the African field, with the recommendation that both the Bible School and the C. E. Society each furnish the expense of a pupil in some mission school under the care of Friends.

"I have no objection to the plan if it will not involve an expense too heavy to be borne without impoverishing some other department," said the retired farmer. "After the every-member canvass tomorrow, we can tell better what our resources will be," said another. "We never know our possibilities until we try," said a third, while the young school teacher said that he would guarantee not only that the Bible School and C. E. Society would take care of the two pupils, but would raise one-third the sum needed for the salary of the missionary. The matter was finally approved, conditioned upon the foreign mission department ascertaining whether or not the plan could be financed properly, and subject to the approval of the American Friends Board of Foreign Missions.

The Temperance Committee reported that a largely attended temperance mass meeting had been held, and that there was a growing feeling that the good people of Newtown should unite for a campaign to vote the eleven saloons out. A disgraceful affair at one of the city's rum shops a few weeks ago had added greatly to the feeling that the time had come for action. The meeting endorsed the proposition and the Temperance Committee was instructed to use its good offices in bringing about a federative movement for an election to prohibit the sale of liquor in the city.

Some of the members were burdened about the apparent disregard of the Sabbath day and reports that gambling and the social evil were allowed to exist in the city. After considerable discussion a special committee of five was named to interview the mayor and the chief of police on the question, and express the concern of the congregation upon these matters. The Committee on General Federative work was directed to solicit the co-operation of the other churches of the city in this matter.

Thus it was that religion was becoming a practical matter in Slow Valley Meeting. The spirit of consecration had begotten a spirit of service and the members were answering the question affirmatively, "Am I my brother's keeper?" Before adjournment, one of the women remarked that Slow Valley Meeting had apparently outgrown its name, a passing remark that is already being taken seriously by some of the members. This prompted the resident minister to say that what had happened at Newtown could happen in any Friends meeting that would only give the welfare of the community a large place in its affections and in its prayers. By saving others they had found that salvation had come to themselves.

We here leave for awhile the fortunes of Slow Valley Meeting, but the record will not be complete without saying that on the Sabbath following the Monthly Meeting, the every-member canvass developed pledges aggregating $1,835.00 for missions, an increase of 147 per cent. over two years before, and ample amounts for current expenses, including $250.00 more on the pastor's salary, and a working sum for each of the principal departments.

NOTE.—If we mistake not, our readers will enjoy catching glimpses now and then of the progress of this remarkable congregation, which apparently is in process of solving the problem of how to make a Friends meeting successful.—Ed.

A Confession and a Warning

The following taken from Alfred S. Dyer's "The Master and the Book," illustrates the deplorable results of mistaken (though it may be sincere) teaching in regard to the fundamental truths of the Bible. Such a confession contains a lesson which all of us will do well to heed.

LUKE WOODARD.

"When Dr. R. A. Torrey visited Toronto some years ago, he addressed a gathering of the ministers of that city and district on faithfulness in the ministry. Among other things he said: 'Remember that because you feed poison innocently, it does not alter its deadly effects.' He then made the following confession:

" 'Last night was a very dark one to me, the bitterest in years, in fact, one of the darkest of my life. When I was in Yale I was pronounced in my views, and had imbibed the teaching of the new theology—not from my professors, however. In the year following me, a bright young fellow entered after having previously studied law. His interest in theology was not deep, and as he was not as strong as I in Hebrew and Greek and Philosophy, he used to refer his difficulties to me for solution. I met them from my "Higher Criticism" and I led him astray. He left Yale and, after filling the pulpits of two or three churches, he left the ministry and returned to his secular profession.

" 'When God in His mercy set me right I went after my old college friend and tried to bring him back, but I could not. The last time I parted from him in New England he said to me: "Torrey, if I were to define my position, I should call myself a Christian agnostic." As he had been living in Philadelphia, I was looking forward to shortly seeing this old companion with the earnest hope that possibly in the warmth and glow of those union meetings he might be led back to Christ, but last night I received word that he had dropped dead. I led him astray, God forgive me! I can never lead him back. One of the most promising lives New England ever saw utterly wasted.' "

Miscellaneous

The Missionary Education Movement will hold five conferences in the United States this summer, as follows: Blue Ridge, N. C., June 26 to July 5; Pacific Grove, Calif., July 3-12; Silver Bay, Lake George, N. Y., July 10-19; Estes Park, Colorado, July 17-26; Lake Geneva, Wisconsin, August 4-13. Further information can be had by addressing Missionary Education Movement, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City, N. Y.

Northfield Seminary will celebrate the thirty-fifth anniversary of its founding by D. L. Moody in June. An attendance of nearly 1,000 old students is expected. All old students who come back to commencement, come as the guests of the school.

Current Items of Interest to Friends

CALIFORNIA YEARLY MEETING

El Modeno, California.—A series of meetings was held at this place beginning March 4th and closing March 22d. W. H. Bertram, pastor at Yarba Linda, California, was the evangelist in charge. The old-time gospel of salvation from sin was proclaimed in the power of the spirit, and it brought old-time conviction for sin, and many came to the altar as soon as the invitation was given. Souls were saved, the Church was greatly strengthened and twenty-two have so far united with the Church either by letter or request. God is richly blessing this community.

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING

East Bethel, Indiana.—East Bethel Meeting was organized and their Church rededicated on April 5th, by a committee from Fairmount Monthly Meeting, with a charter membership of thirty-nine. For a good many years the Methodist Protestants had held meeting there, but their class went down and the church building was sold for debt. A citizen of the community bought it and then the community asked Friends to come in and hold meetings there. A successful revival was held last winter and a live Bible School maintained throughout the winter for the first time in the history of the Church. Richard Haworth, of Fairmount, preached the dedicatory sermon. The small debt on the house was soon lifted and a complete organization effected for a local meeting. Ephraim O. Allen and Morton Whybrew preach there on alternate Sabbaths, with Thurlow Shugart preaching for them on the fifth Sabbath. The meeting is located four miles northeast of Fairmount, Indiana, and gives promise of becoming a strong meeting.

KANSAS YEARLY MEETING

Stafford, Kansas.—The gospel team from Stafford was sent north twenty miles to hold services at two school houses. They held three services and eleven souls were saved. The Scovilles will be here the last of May to hold a union tabernacle meeting. Our meetings are all well attended. Our subject for discussion the 17th is "What Friends Believe as a Church." Abel J. Bond, pastor at Stafford, was in Colorado last week.

NEW YORK YEARLY MEETING

New York City, New York.—For the benefit of persons who cannot conveniently attend the meeting at Twentieth Street, New York City, a Friends' meeting has been held for each First-day afternoon in a room of Union Theological Seminary. These meetings have been well attended by Friends of all branches, and there has been large freedom of service. They close with the present month, and will probably be resumed in the autumn.

NORTH CAROLINA YEARLY MEETING

Guilford College, North Carolina.—W. J. Sayers, of Poughkeepsie, New York, held a series of meetings at the college, under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A., from March 29th to April 3d, which were very helpful to all the student body. Great interest was taken in the meeting by all classes of students, as is shown by the fact that all the young men attended, filling the hall to its utmost capacity. Mr. Sayers' ability to point a moral with an appropriate illustration, together with his warm personality, always made his message very effective. There were many individual conferences, while nineteen requested special prayer. The two meetings which Mr. Sayers held with the young women were filled with the same spiritual atmosphere. His talks at the chapel exercises were also full of interest, lively enthusiasm, and whole-hearted consecration. Many of us will long give thanks for this week in our college life. It was a week of serious reflection for all and deepened religious life for many, a time when the whole student body seemed to be under the sway of the Holy Spirit in a manner seldom seen in a student generation.

OHIO YEARLY MEETING

Mt. Gilead, Ohio.—The Gilead Friends' meeting at Mt. Gilead, Ohio, George E. Kent, pastor, assisted in an Evangelistic Tabernacle Meeting at Cardington, Ohio, from February 22 to March 22, under the leadership of Ira Evans Hicks and party. Over five hundred came forward and received definite blessing. Most of these joined some church of their choice. Every effort was made at the time of prayer to instruct and pray with those coming forward. All the churches were built up spiritually aside from the accessions, and the country was stirred for miles around. Mr. Hicks is a clear, forcible exponent of Gospel truth and fearlessly denounces sin in all forms. Gilead Friends received several new members.

OREGON YEARLY MEETING

Newberg, Oregon.—At Newberg, Oregon, the work of the Church and Pacific College is progressing most encouragingly. On Easter Sunday the Bible School numbered 330 with a men's class of 62, a young men's class of 43, and a women's class of about the same number. The music of the school is led each Sunday by an orchestra and a choir of young girls. The meeting is growing steadily, and the pastor, Charles O. Whitley, in addition to his heavy work, has been doing much valuable work in nearby districts. He recently conducted a series of meetings at the little church at Rex in the gap of Chehalem mountain, three miles east of Newberg. Each night he was accompanied by a company of students from the college who aided in every way possible. Among these were Robert Dann, son of Arthur and Eliza Dann, Delbert Replogle, son of Charles and May Replogle, Ross and Lyra Miles, son and daughter of B. C. and Anna Miles, and other children of well-known Friends. Others of the students who had not done so took a definite stand for Christ. Emmett Gulley, a worthy student, whose home is in Idaho, won the local peace contest on April 7th, and will represent Pacific College in the state peace contest to be held in Portland in this month. The College entertained the Intercollegiate prohibition convention April 10 and 11. A prohibition oratorical contest was held on the evening of the 10th, in which eight colleges contested. Pacific College was represented by Lisle Hubbard, who won first place on thought and composition, although the general average gave the prize to another. The Ladies' Auxiliary to the college served luncheon to the convention on the 11th, at which President Levi T. Pennington acted as toastmaster. On the same day the Auxiliary conducted a successful window sale of fancy articles and eatables. These ladies have subscribed $3,000 to the endowment of the college and are working hard to fulfill their pledge. Branch auxiliaries at Salem, Oregon, and at Seattle, Washington, are giving valuable assistance in different ways. The work of making attractive driveways and the planting of trees and flowers on the college campus has been undertaken by the Newberg ladies. April 2d was observed as campus day when students, teachers and friends labored earnestly in a general cleanup. The ladies served a picnic lunch at noon, and after the work was completed a baseball game ended the program of the day. The members of the faculty are enthusiastic in their praise of the work of the student body. The young people are almost without exception hard working, and many of them are working their way through college. The work of Henry and Mary Allen in the dormitory is much appreciated. They have made the place so homelike that rooms are more sought for than ever before and the Board is considering the need of added accommodations for next year.

WESTERN YEARLY MEETING

Mooresville, Indiana.—A splendid musical cantata was given by the Friends' Choral Society on Easter night. The cantata was a musical narrative of the "Death and Resurrection" of Christ.

West Union, Illinois.—Everett Scotten of Columbus, Ohio, visited West Union on two recent Sundays and preached to the edification of the people. He also gave an interesting lecture on White Slavery at the M. E. Church.

West Union observed Easter Sunday as rally day in the Sunday School and Easter services followed. A goodly number of people were out to enjoy the services.

WILMINGTON YEARLY MEETING

New Burlington, Ohio.—Easter Sunday was set apart as "Go to Church" day, and Amos Cook, of Harveysburg, preached a very helpful and inspiring sermon at the Friends' Church. His text was John 11: 28, "The Master has come and calleth for thee." At the close of the services a welcome was given to those who had recently united with the Church, and the doors of the Church were also opened at this time. One came forward, making nineteen who have joined recently. In the evening the W. F. M. Society held a public meeting. The opening of the Easter Egg Mite Boxes resulted in $31.39. This more than completed the $50.00 pledged for the new station soon to be occupied by Arthur and Enda Chilson in Africa.

PILGRIMAGE TO NEWARK

There was a Pilgrimage to Newark Meeting (Orthodox) under the auspices of the New York Joint Fellowship Committee on April 19th. In addition to visiting the morning meeting at 11:00 a. m., Friends met in a conference at 2:30 p. m., to consider the topic, "Who is my brother's keeper?" The Newark meeting is held in the Y. M. C. A. Building, corner of Cedar and Halsey Streets.

CORRESPONDENCE

FOWLER, KANSAS,
March 29, 1914.

Editor THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

I have felt for some time that Friends generally should learn of conditions here, so they could at least advise us what to do. Fowler Meeting is the central meeting of Fowler Quarterly Meeting, and in fact, the key to a great field of work for Friends in this western country. For seven years we have maintained an Academy, and the influence that has gone out from the school has been of untold benefit.

The field is large. On west as far as Denver, there is an open field; north, south and east the territory is unlimited. A chain of meetings is being established west and southwest which is extending over the line into Colorado.

Now we are facing a crisis not only in the history of the Academy, but also in the whole work, for the Academy has been the builder of it all. We often read in our church papers that the academy's work is a dying work and that it has served its day and must give place to the larger and better equipped institutions. Following these instructions a number of our academies have promptly closed their doors and others are contemplating following suit. We agree that in order to keep their place as a vital factor in our work they must be better equipped and better financed.

To some of us who have spent so much of our time in the academy service, the work is dear, but we do not feel we want to continue in a dying work or a work that does not count for the Church, or a work that is not worth putting our lives into, so we are made to exclaim "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" The high school board of the town is negotiating with the academy board for the purchase of the Academy building and grounds consisting of five acres located within the city limits. This is one of the best academy buildings in Kansas and is in good repair. The location is ideal for a high school building. The total indebtedness is something near $1,900.00. Crops have been poor here for the last two years and all the expenses incident to a new country has made it burdensome to maintain the academy.

We have been told by men of means that if we would continue the work they would help quite materially, but we meet with the saying "That all the academies will have to go sooner or later and we had as well stop now while we have a chance to sell." The wheat prospects are the best ever seen here, and it seems to some of us that we could not see the work laid down at this time. It is more of a responsibility than we can carry alone and we think others should spare or at least manifest an interest in some way so the board could be encouraged to continue. Library, equipment, endowment and present needs must be considered, and could the work be tidied over the present crisis, we feel sure its future is assured.

Very truly,

JOHN HOWARD.

ANNUAL GATHERING OF FRIENDS IN SPRINGFIELD, MASSACHUSETTS

It is a great privilege to be a Friend. For some of us it does not mean the privilege of attending meeting very often. Here in the valley of the Connecticut River we have had a meeting for worship once a year for six years now. This has come about through the hospitality of Ellen C. Winslow and her mother, who live at 100 Monmouth Street, Springfield, Massachusetts. In their home about forty Friends can be gathered from Hartford, South Hadley, Northampton, Brimfield, Northfield, and other towns and cities within an hour or two of Springfield, which is the natural center.

We meet there because we are or have been Friends and because we yearn for the association with those who know the Friendly way. This year, three branches of Friends were represented and upwards of ten yearly meetings. The chief concern expressed this year was that Friends might resume religious visits all up and down this region. It is a populous farming and manufacturing country, needing to be quickened in religious living and fellowship. There is little knowledge of Friends and, we believe, much need of them. Such places as Meriden, Waterbury, Hartford, Springfield, Palmer, Westfield, Pittsfield, Holyoke, Chicopee, Northampton, Greenfield, North Adams and a score of others reaching to the Canadian line, are easily accessible by railways, and many of the parishes would welcome the message of Friends occasionally.

Well, we met on the fifth of Fourth month in the home so hospitably opened to us, and as usual, had a religious meeting of deep feeling and helpfulness. Many there had never met each other before, but all were able to realize the privilege of worship almost as easily as if the occasion came often.

BIBLE SCHOOL LESSON

May 3.

Subject.—The Prodigal Son.Lesson.—Luke 15: 11-32. (Temperance Lesson.)Golden Text.—I will arise and to go my father, and will say unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight. Luke 15: 18.

The prodigality of our American life in drink and in riotous living calls for a reckoning that cannot be avoided. The only solution will be the solution which the prodigal son gave to a similar problem, although a personal one, "I will arise and go to my father."

He forsook his drunkenness and his sin, turned his back upon it all and went back home. The American nation can never come into its own, never can enjoy its heritage to the full until it quits licensing the liquor traffic, quits making drunkards out of its sons and daughters.

The prodigal probably did have a good home, and he left home in spite of it all. Today our nation fosters and promotes prodigality by fostering and promoting the saloon, and then when the sons and daughters wander away and are lost in sin, outcasts from society, drunkards, criminals, harlots, insane, all because of drink, we make it impossible for them to return to their first estate, and must confine them in prisons and asylums, and ostracise them from social contact with decent citizenship.

Some day the nation will wake up to the crime it is perpetrating against itself, against the members of its own household, in fostering or even permitting the open saloon. The home, the Church, society, business, labor, the government, all must suffer and continue to suffer, because as yet the people have found it easier and more convenient and more politic to let the liquor traffic go on than to destroy it.

But what an awful price we are paying and must continue to pay for generations to come, for our negligence and indifference to the enormity of this crime against our civilization! The people are waking. Yes But oh, so slowly! While we tarry, our boys and our girls, by the tens of thousands, are becoming drunkards. The time is past due for the sentence of death to be passed upon the un-American rum traffic.

MARY SIBBITT IN IOWA

Mary Sibbitt of Kansas Yearly Meeting came to Iowa on November 15th, and has covered the greater part of the fourteen Quarterly Meetings in public work under the direction of the Yearly Meeting Temperance Committee. All expenses have been met by free-will offerings and some money has been left in the treasury of the Committee. In addition, about $150.00 has been given to purity work. Her addresses on the "White Slave Traffic" have brought splendid results. She gave this lecture five times in Des Moines, and some of the ministers and mothers' clubs have asked her to return and give it in the big coliseum later on.

Mrs. Sibbitt has spent more than a month in Des Moines helping in the recent campaign which resulted in the defeat of the candidates supported by the liquor men. She gave thirty-eight addresses and on the morning after the election the Des Moines Register and Leader said: "The Kansas Cyclone came, saw and conquered. More good, moral citizens voted this year than ever before in our history, and they accomplished what they usually accomplish when they get waked up. The Register and Leader wishes to recommend the Kansas mother to any who need this kind of help." Mrs. Sibbitt has recently begun a two months' campaign of the state under the direction of the W. C. T. U.

NEW LIFE

Found in Change to Right Food

After one suffers for months from acid dyspepsia, sour stomach, and then finds the remedy is in getting the right kind of food, it is something to speak about.

A N. Y. lady and her young son had such an experience and she wants others to know how to get relief. She writes: "For about fifteen months my little boy and myself had suffered with sour stomach. We were unable to retain much of anything we ate.

"After suffering in this way for so long I decided to consult a specialist in stomach diseases. Instead of prescribing drugs, he put us both on Grape-Nuts and we began to improve immediately.

"It was the key to a new life. I found we had been eating too much heavy food which we could not digest. In a few weeks after commencing Grape-Nuts, I was able to do my house work. I wake in the morning with a clear head and feel rested and have no sour stomach. My boy sleeps well and wakes with a laugh.

"We have regained our lost weight and continue to eat Grape-Nuts for both the morning and evening meals. We are well and happy and owe it to Grape-Nuts."

JAMES F. BEALS

James F. Beals was born in Burk County, North Carolina, May 18, 1839. He came to Green County, Tennessee, at the age of eight years, where he remained until he was a young man, then entered Friendsville Academy and spent several years as a student in that institution.

He was converted early in life and joined the M. E. Church. While in Friendsville Academy he became acquainted with the principles for which the Friends' Church stood, accepted them as his own, and united with the Friends' Church.

The beginning of the Civil War found him at New Hope, the Friends' settlement in Green County, teaching school. All went well until the passing of the Conscript Act by the Tennessee legislature on November 1, 1862. This act provided that all able-bodied male citizens between the ages of eighteen and forty-five should appear at their respective county seats and be enrolled, and that the state militia should arrest as deserters all who failed to comply. James F. Beals felt that he ought to obey God's law rather than man's, and that God had commanded men to love their enemies instead of killing them, so he failed to appear, but was nevertheless enrolled in one of the companies and ordered to appear for muster. This order he also disregarded for which he was courtmartialled and fined.

Soon after a company of soldiers came to the school house and ordered him to appear at their headquarters. He complied but was allowed after a short while to return to his duties in the school room. It was not long until the school house was again surrounded with soldiers. The young teacher was arrested and compelled to march all day with the soldiers as they went from house to house, searching cellar and garret for other offenders. The night was spent by the prisoners in camp and next morning they were taken before the enrolling officer to be assigned to their companies. When James F. Beals appeared, the enrolling officer's wife, who was the daughter of a prominent Union man, was present and entered an earnest plea for his release, which was granted.

Our young Friend felt that school teaching at New Hope was no longer either safe or profitable; others were being forced to the front, cast into prison, shot or hung for the same offence he was guilty of, so on hearing of a company of men, about fifteen hundred, preparing to start for Union territory, he joined them. The confederates heard of their flight and a regiment of cavalymen started in hot pursuit. The company of footmen evaded them, however, and by wading streams, climbing mountains and pushing their way through thickets, reached Cumberland Gap which was held by the Union forces. Most of the men enlisted in the Federal army, but James F. Beals was no more inclined to take up arms against the confederates than for them. He was offered a captain's place in the Union army, but declined, and obtaining a federal pass, he with two other young men, started for Indiana, but met Reynolds' Brigade of the confederate army and were arrested and bought back to Tennessee.

After marching eight hundred miles, the last three hundred barefooted, through dust and heat, in the month of August, much of the time without food or water, this man with convictions and the courage to stand by them, reached Knoxville, where he was released and granted a permit to pursue his profession of teaching for another year.

When the year was up he avoided arrest by the confederates by going to Knoxville, where General Burnside's headquarters were located.

On returning to Friendsville, where he had imbibed the religious convictions for which he was fighting so bravely, he found the people without food or grain on which to produce another crop, not even grain for seed. A movement was started at once to supply their need and our young "Soldier of the Cross" was sent to visit the more favored localities in the north in search of food. His mission was a decided success. He obtained several car loads of provisions and grain, also considerable money with which to relieve his suffering friends.

After the war was ended he continued his activity in the interest of the Prince of Peace by serving the Church, State and Nation whenever, wherever, and in whatever way he could without crossing his convictions of right. He was for many years an elder in the Friends' Church, Chairman of the Board of Trustees of Friendsville Academy, Chairman of the Court of Blount County, and postmaster at Friendsville, also holding various other offices and positions of responsibility.

He journeyed beyond the three score and ten mile-post almost five years, but continued active to the end which came abruptly on the morning of March 19th, as the result of an attack of acute indigestion.

A widow, five sons, six daughters, and a host of friends are left to realize more than ever before how hard they have leaned on their friend who is gone. May each heart be opened to receive in its fullness the spirit which filled his life and enabled him to fight the good fight until his course was finished.

and successfully prepares for College some twenty pupils a year.

Because of its nearness to Philadelphia it is surrounded by a large group of devoted friends who are continually helping the School, and bringing to it their religious concerns, and their interest in the of the children. This gives the School an atmosphere of religious feeling, and of culture and earnestness of purpose quite common in our Friends' Colleges, but almost unique among Boarding Schools.

Under the Potter's Wheel

Turn not the potter's wheels of years
Aback upon its spirit reel,
But check the flaws that thou may see
Can mar and cause the clay in time
To crumble or the jar to be a castaway
With misshaped urns for briny tears
Of sad regret.
Know thou the best is yet for thee;
Weep not o'er faults ago,
Work on, endure the test, till dawn
Of morrow opes her golden gate,
Then enter in and rest securely,
And do not wait one moment
When the angel beckons thee.

Elijah's Farewell to the Brook

BY FRANK CORNELL

Oh, vanished stream, how thou hast cheered my heart
Through the long days, when on thy banks I dwelt,
But I must bid farewell, and soon depart
And leave the shade, where oft in prayer I knelt.

How oft the starlit heaven would reflected be
In thy clear pool—so near my door,
As thou did'st rest thy journey to the sea,
And wait for strength to travel more.

No voice but thine brought music to mine ear,
Thy rippling murmur hushed to quiet sleep
Till morning came, so bright and clear,
And thy full notes I sought, with love so deep.

But on the distant hills, that seemed so far,
No shower fell, as day by day went by,
And thou could'st not mirror the evening star,
As he looked from yonder cloudless sky.

Farewell, dear Cherith; in Zidon must I dwell,
And be a stream of life to one in need,
The lesson thou hast taught so well,
Bids now my footsteps speed.

Every-Member Canvass

We would like to have a list of Friends' meetings in the United States and Canada which have conducted an every-member canvass during the past year and especially within recent weeks, for the purpose of raising funds. We desire also a brief statement setting forth the results of such a canvass. Information on these matters should be sent to THE AMERICAN FRIEND, Richmond, Indiana, giving the name and location of the meeting, the date of the canvass and results in brief.

Philadelphia Yearly Meeting

Philadelphia Yearly Meeting was in session last week, the Representative Meeting and the Meeting of Ministers and Elders having convened on the 17th and 18th. We hope to have an adequate report for next week's issue.

Liquor Consumption Declining

For the first three months of 1914, according to Revenue Collector Gilligan, of Cincinnati, there was a decrease in consumption of 74,617 barrels of beer and 175,250 gallons of whisky, as compared with the corresponding three months of 1913. How is that for one internal revenue district for three months? Is it any wonder the booze business is in a panic and that liquor securities are almost worthless?—American Issue.

Prison Philanthropy

The recent volume of the "Journal of Prison Discipline and Philanthropy," published by the Pennsylvania Prison Society, contains seventy-two pages of commanding interest. The president of the Society and about a dozen of the managers are Friends, but the subjects they have at heart should appeal to our whole membership more than is apparent.—Philadelphia Friend.

Hearings on Prohibition

On April 15th and 16th, public hearings were had at Washington in favor of the national prohibition resolution now pending before the House and Senate Judiciary Committees. Numerous temperance people representing various temperance interests were heard in a plea for early action by Congress on this question. These included leading officers of the Anti-Saloon League, the W. C. T. U., and various denominational committees. Friends were represented by Sarah H. Hoge, who also spoke for the W. C. T. U., of which she is a state and national officer, and by S. E. Nicholson, Chairman of Friends' Legislative and Temperance Board. No one can tell what the results will be, but there appears to be considerable sentiment in Congress in favor of bringing the resolution to a vote this session.

The Scope of the Gospel Plan

The gospel of Jesus is a gospel for all humanity and for every age. Stripped of its man-made interpretations and its overwrought ecclesiastical garb, it has a message for every human need and condition. That it has not met with universal acceptance does not argue against the universality of its application or the potency of its truth.

Too frequently the gospel has been cheapened into a counterfeited article that is neither attractive nor helpful. There is no salvation in a formula. Spiritual progress does not emanate from rites and ceremonies. Christianity is a leaven and leaven is life. Whether the Church is an end or a means is the gauge of its ability to win humanity for the Kingdom of Jehovah. Materialism will thrive in the midst of legalisms that find no common definition in the Christian Church, but it speedily dissolves in the white heat of an untainted gospel that brings human life face to face with its opportunities under the direct leading of the Holy Spirit.

Christianity is not a badge whereon is inscribed the trade-mark of a professional religion. Phariseeism was the antithesis of the new birth into the Father's kingdom. Hypocrisy was never symbolized in any message which Jesus ever brought to the world. His mission was for the healing of the nations, and his mission will never be fulfilled until His church becomes the potential agency to bring to all men a vision of Jesus Christ.

The highest type of Christian service is the incorporation of the Divine life into every condition of human society. The gospel has been individualized to its own hurt. Its operations have been circumscribed and narrowed until in Christian America two-thirds of our people have assumed no visible obligations of Christian discipleship.

The gospel of the Son of God will not have met its highest test until the Christian religion has been incorporated into the every day life of the people. The world of trade and commerce, the world of politics and government, the world of professionalism, the world of society, all need to feel the regenerating touch of the gospel. International relationships must be governed by the dictum of its teachings and world statesmanship must be transformed by its standards of truth. All this is included in the scope of the plan of human redemption.

The world must find its equipoise in the gospel plan. Modern civilization must find its bearings in the presence of a living Christ. To the awakening world must be proclaimed the message of the regenerated and the transformed life, and to it there must be revealed the master Personage of all the ages, ready now as in the opening days of that first century to speak to every human condition. To the Church has been committed the keys that will unlock the storehouse of abounding grace for humanity's needs everywhere. It is time that the Church were about its Master's business.

The Mexican Crisis

The best thing that can be said about our national relationship with Mexico at this time is that it is deplorable. We are well aware that in a crisis like this criticism will not solve perplexing problems. Now that the government is so dangerously near the verge of war, the real friends of peace will be the last persons to complicate the situation still further.

We cannot avoid, however, questioning the adequacy of a cause for the present military operations in our neighboring country beyond the Rio Grande, especially when we remember the long list of apparently unnoticed atrocities that have been going on under the guise of revolution for many months. We do not believe that in any case the United States was obligated to assume the guardianship of Mexico. Our concern now is that there was less justification for intervention because of the recent occurrence at Tampico, than because of the outrages of a year and more in which American lives and property have apparently been sacrificed without hindrance.

When one man wrongs another and then makes restitution by apology or otherwise, it is tyranny to go further and compel the guilty one to humiliate himself by bowing the knee in acknowledgment of the superiority of the other. While having no sympathy whatever with the dictatorial reign of Huerta, we cannot help wondering whether the same demands for the salutation of the flag would have been made upon a stronger nation. It seems clear to us that after apologies had been made for the act of a petty, officious general, the mere refusal to go further and perform an act of national humiliation is not sufficient justification to bring the country to the verge of bloody war.

Having said this, it is a pleasure to commend the extreme caution which President Wilson and Secretary Bryan are apparently taking against precipitating further hostilities. How further bloodshed can be avoided we are unable to see in the face of the existing tension, but every lover of peace will applaud the hesitancy of the administration during the days following the seizure of Vera Cruz to permit any act on the part of either the army or the navy that would provoke additional trouble. That America could assume permanent control of Mexico either through ownership or a protectorate is unthinkable. Shall we not pray that supreme wisdom be given those in authority that the present crisis be relieved without the injustice of further bloodshed?

The Spirit and Importance of the English Tramp

BY THOMAS E. JONES

(CONCLUDED)

Thus far we have been considering the origin and external characteristics of the English Tramp. Let us now turn to the deeper or spiritual side.

This seems to me to spring, in the first place, out of the purpose of the meeting. As a spiritual agent of God, it seeks to bring Christ in a new way to struggling meetings. Here are manifest two phases to which the Tramp must minister: first, deepening the spiritual life of the Tramp himself; and second, enlivening the spiritual condition of a needy meeting. In every Tramp there is an effort to carry out these two ideas.

In the cycling tour we always sought a time when we could meet as a group alone with God. We opened our hearts and His Spirit filled us with a message of love and good cheer for the work to which we were going. I shall not forget one of these meetings held on the banks of the Trent river not far from Gainsboro. Here a combination of God and nature manifest in the cool shade, the broad river, the sloping hillside, and our silent meeting thrilled and filled us all. As never before, I felt the tremendous power of a fellowship meeting. Every heart seemed to melt into one great purpose. We longed to give more of our lives to our Heavenly Father that we might take His message of "Glad Tidings" to those who needed it so much. We prayed as never before for the work to which we are going, and God heard our prayers we felt, and prepared the hearts of our hearers.

Throughout the Tramp we had many times of deep spiritual infilling. Each of us knew God was present as we went on our missionary journey. We felt Him especially when wandering over the fields of heather near Matlock, on the moor near Chesterfield, and in Dorothy Vernon's garden at Haddon Hall.

This same deep spirit was felt in the Wensley Dale Tramp. It filled us from the first hour when the leader outlined the needs of that particular section. Somehow we felt God had called us to this field for a special work. Each of us prayed that we might bring back something of the burning spirit of love and enthusiasm that had been so strongly manifest here in the days of George Fox, John Audlin, Richard Hubberthorne and John Camm. The leader showed that Friends here needed to worship their form of meeting less and their Christ more. This message gripped everyone, but we found it necessary to settle this point in our own mind before we could lead others. Consequently in the forenoon discussion of the second day, the subject of a pastoral or non-pastoral system came up. Friends in this particular section knew but little of the pastoral System and what little they had heard had been very much colored by prejudice. A most excellent discussion followed in which everybody came together in a wonderful spirit of harmony. These Friends came to have great sympathy with the pastoral meeting, saying that they themselves needed more evangelism in their work and we agreed most heartily that we must steer our pastoral idea in a channel that will lead back to the early type of Friends meeting. I consider this a triumph of an English Tramp. Opening our hearts and minds in sympathy we found we were one. It is needless to say that God worked mightily among us that night.

There was a further manifestation of the spirit of a Young Friends Tramp in our meeting near Ashford. From the first hour on the grounds, we felt all had met for something greater than a holiday experience. I think I am not exaggerating when I say we felt the spirit of God was actually present watching about our camp, guarding our thoughts and filling us with power for our tasks. In the first address of the conference Mr. Headley, our host, a deeply spiritual man, said that he had been looking forward to such a meeting in Kentshire for years. For two or three months he had been actually getting ready for us. He said while building the sheds he prayed for the meeting. With every nail he drove home, he uttered a little prayer that somehow it would be blessed of God to help in His Kingdom. Our hearts were lifted in the period of silence, we all prayed that we might have a share in the great work that was to be done there.

Each morning we spent in listening to two or three well-prepared addresses on subjects of vital interest, like the women's movement, social service, the rural problem, and Bible study. There was always a period for discussion after these addresses. Many times we held radically different opinions, but always felt the deepest sympathy for each other; and always parted better friends and broader minded. We spent the afternoons in holding meetings with Friends in the surrounding districts. Though we found these meetings small for the most part, perhaps averaging not over thirty, yet we did not feel the lack of spiritual life. In each meeting we observed a period of silence in which invariably all were deeply blessed. Following this meeting was a time for discussion in which Friends tried to discover what could be done to revive the meeting. Frankly and freely they told us their problem and we tried to help them find a solution. We returned to camp each night and held a devotional meeting before retiring. You can imagine what inspiring times we had. Indeed, we had been apostles sent out to proclaim the word of God and had come back home to receive comfort for failures; added light on difficult problems, and an infilling of spiritual life.

I shall not forget one meeting, near the close of the Tramp, when our hearts went out in love and fellowship to those of the movement who had gone from England to other fields of work. Every heart was filled with love and prayer, and somehow we felt that God heard and our brothers heard though they were many miles away. Such times of spiritual communion resulted in great blessing to all the Trampers. It broadened our minds and sympathies by bringing together people from all sections of England; melted our hearts together in one common purpose of loving ministry; gave new life and impetus to dead meetings; made Quakerism popular with many young people, who might otherwise have left the Society; gave a chance for many people to find something to do in the denomination; and opened the doors of the Society to the public, thereby breaking down the old idea that Friends were a sort of family church in which nobody is welcome but the select few.

It is impossible to estimate the importance of such a movement upon the Society as a whole. Yet we know that this Tramp idea is growing and has spread until no less than four continents have been touched by it. In three of these it has taken definite form and is doing much towards bringing various branches of Quakers together under a broader and fuller realization of the message and importance of Quakerism in the world. In conclusion let me say, that the Tramp is peculiarly adapted to the group method of worship, but it can be used by Friends who practice any form of worship. It seems to me that the spirit of interchange, hearty co-operation and fellowship could be greatly strengthened throughout our Society by a wider introduction of the English Tramp.

Hartford, Connecticut.

The week of June 15-25 will be observed as Sunday School week by the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago. Some of the most prominent speakers in Sunday School work will be on the program. All who attend will be welcomed to any of the classes of the Institute.

The Rural Meeting

BY ANNA E. HILL

For some time the subject of rural meetings have been a concern, and increasingly so as the situation has grown more acute.

Much has been written, and much by the people who had no knowledge of conditions in country communities. Every once in a while some magazine or periodical comes out with a story of how some certain church has met with signal success. The story is eagerly read and with pleasure, but only to find that in each and every case this success has come through some unusually gifted minister. Again hope is dashed, for it is only too true that such men are few or not to be found in every church.

In THE AMERICAN FRIEND of January 8th appeared an article on "The Duty of the Church to the Community," which seems to the writer the most practical of anything which has yet appeared, in as much as the suggestions are feasible and in keeping with Friendly ideas and ideals. These suggestions are all good, but the thought which has for some time appealed to me is the one set forth in number four, "It is not a church pastor that is primarily needed," etc.

In almost every meeting we have talent among our young people which should be developed. In every meeting we have young people who would work and with a will if only the effort was apparently leading some place.

In many meetings, I doubt not there may be found a social worker who would be glad to devote much time to various activities for the building up of that particular meeting, if only the meeting would pay a sum sufficient to make that possible. Each meeting should study its own needs and take stock of the various talents available. Thus would our wide awake, energetic young people be developed and saved to us and the life of our own church assured. The one involves the other.

Let me say I am often amazed that more is not made of the fact by our ministers—except in talk—that the children of today must be the church of tomorrow. In many places the services could with great profit be shortened so they need not be irksome to the younger people and thus wearisome to the parents.

In a few meetings there are frequent or occasional attempts in which the Sunday School and following services are combined, and in which the children take some part and to whom a short sermon is preached to the profit of the whole membership.

Let us quit patronizing, quit preaching at the young people, but make them a part of the Church, set them to work, real work, and the solution of the problem of the rural church at least for some Friends may be new.

Carthage, Indiana.

"The glad reliance that comes upon the man; the sense of trust; a rest with God; the soul's exceeding peace; the universal harmony; the infinite within; sympathy with the Soul of All—is bliss that words cannot portray."—Theodore Parker.

Concerning Luther, Calvin and Fox

BY MARY M. HOBBS

I am in receipt of the following request from the editor of THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

"I have a letter from.....asking that thee give the book and chapter which includes what thee said in thy recent article in THE AMERICAN FRIEND on 'Church Loyalty,' about Luther, Calvin and Fox. I am passing the request on to thee and perhaps thee can give him the information."

As several letters of similar import have come directly to me, I infer that, quite contrary to my expectation, the reference to those individuals, made in my article, has puzzled some of our Friends.

Almost any good history will give the facts in regard to Luther, Calvin and Erasmus. We must, however, distinguish between those written by the adherents of these men and those written from purely historical research. The one will apologize, minimize and condone offences simply because the authors are anxious to establish an ideal character for their leader; the other, searching for the truth first, will state facts and let them speak for themselves.

The last book in which I read statements concerning these men, is "A Short History of Germany," by Ernest F. Henderson. Any who wish can verify my statements by reading the pages concerning the Peasants' War, especially pages 323, 324. Or if one wishes to understand a little more of the limitations of the great reformer, he might also turn to pages 370-373. To this latter I did not care to allude, because my sole object in recalling these things was to show that we are all influenced by the general attitude of our times and form our conclusions largely from the teaching we receive.

As to Calvin's severity, read pages 398, 399. In the trial of Servetus, which resulted in his being burned at the stake, Calvin took an active part. He would have preferred, it is stated, that the block be substituted for the stake, which indeed would have been more merciful. These things may be found in the Encyclopedia Britannica or almost any reliable history; Schaff's Church History, Vol. VI, page 65 and on. Vol. VII, look for the word Calvin. There are too many pages to mention.

George Fox was a most remarkable man. He was, however, not so distinct in his own time as he appears to us in our day. England was in a religious turmoil and there were hundreds of men and women teaching and following strange doctrines, and amongst so many there was necessarily much that was not wise nor conducive to the health of the nation. If we study carefully the history of the period and the conditions prevailing, and then imagine a man of Fox's personality thrust athwart these conditions, we shall not wonder that he met rather rough usage. Nor shall we be surprised that some of his ideas and beliefs were those of his own time.

Almost every one believed in witches in his day. There was Biblical ground for belief in witches, and he was very ready to substantiate his assertions by quotations from the Bible. As an instance of this, we may recall his reply to Judge Glyn, "that the three children were cast into the fiery furnace at Nebuchadnezzar's commands with their coats, their hose and their hats on." Now it turns out that the word translated "hats" would more properly be translated "mantles." We may well believe that he would have substantiated his belief in witches by quoting from the experience of Saul. At any rate, here is what he says himself. The passage is taken from "George Fox," by Thomas Hodgkin, D.C.L., and is found on page 95, near the bottom: "Fox then passed on into a neighboring village where he astonished the people by speaking sharply to a woman and telling her that she was a witch. Whereupon she went out of the room. Now I (these are Fox's own words) being a stranger there and knowing nothing of the woman outwardly, the people wondered at it, and told me afterwards that I had discovered a great thing, for all the country looked upon her to be a witch." This is taken from the original manuscript of Fox's Journal, which Mr. Hodgkin says he used.

In comparing this passage with the account of the same occurrence as given in our version of his journal, I find that the word witches is there altered to unclean. Being aware that the Journal, as we have it, is not a verbatim copy of the original, and as I do not have access to this valuable work, I wrote asking a friend to give me the exact facts and this is his reply:

"Thee is quite right in thy view about George Fox. There are a number of passages in his original Journal, now called the Cambridge Journal, which show that he believed in witches. I will give thee two illustrations. First, from Vol. I, page 110: 'There were some wicked women in the field, hard by the house, and I was sure they were witches, and I was moved to go unto them and declare unto them their condition, and that they were in the spirit of witchcraft.' Another passage, on page 113: 'I was sitting in the house full of people and declaring the word of life unto them, I cast my eye upon an unclean woman and told her she was a witch. I was moved in the Lord's power to talk sharply to her, and so she went out of the room, and the people told me that I had discovered a great thing, and all the country looked upon her to be a witch.'

"I have given these passages in modern spelling, though in the Journal they are given in the original form. When the Journal was edited for final publication by Thomas Elwood, one of these passages was left out entirely, and the other was softened down, so that the reader of the printed Journal would hardly have any ground to suspect that Fox and other Friends believed in witches. There can, however, I believe, be no doubt that he did, and as for that matter, practically everybody else did in that century.

They were still burning them and Fox describes in the manuscript Journal of the burning of a witch in Edinburgh while he was there."

The Romish Church either made saints or martyrs of any man or woman who was distinguished for piety, and many of the former of persons whose halo would appear conspicuous to us by its absence. Other churches in fact, if not in name, have followed the example, and we, of "The Religious Society of Friends," have done the same. I suppose that it is or was a necessary part of the gradual evolution of the human spirit, but I must think that such exaggerated hero worship belongs to a very primitive experience. Discrimination is a difficult attainment and our admiration of some remarkably fine trait in a character in itself is liable, indeed is almost certain, to render us oblivious to traits less worthy. In this way the faults and foibles of those who by their wisdom and goodness have helped to lift others out of the mire and clay, become fastened as necessary attachments to their teachings.

In consideration of the manner in which some of the other methods of George Fox have been regarded as obligatory upon us, the query arises in my mind, whether if the editors had given George's testimony in his own words, we might not now have two other branches in our denomination, the one standing by the original, and the other perhaps questioning the authenticity or doubting the knowledge of the founder of the Society. We would then have had a different kind of orthodoxy.

As an instance, take what Friends called "hat worship." When I was a child, I thought that it was a necessary and very important part of being a Friend for a man to keep his hat rigorously upon his head, and when I saw a young man just returned from Haverford lift his hat to a woman Friend, I thought he had denied the faith and was little better than an "infidel"; and was much surprised that my father seemed so indifferent when I reported the dreadful act to him. It was the trend of the preaching in my childhood that we must conform to the manner and customs of George Fox and the early Friends.

I fully believe that in "the conformity" to much of the detail of early Quakerism the power and passion of that fervent spirit which actuated them was lost. Moreover, I believe that we are still fettered by the policy of a passed time. One is startled in reading that Goethe said that Luther did quite as much harm as good. But when we consider the terrors, the bloodshed, the utter desolation of the Thirty Years' War, we cease to wonder that the poet should have thought as he did.

The great contests in religion have mostly been about ultimately unimportant things in which personal priority played the most important part; and if we study closely the disputes and separations in our own beloved Society, we shall find that we are no exception.

Again, it occurs to me, that this exaltation of personality, making it appear that because a man or woman is good for something, he is therefore good for everything and is to be followed without question or protest, has in many instances had a deadening effect. Goodness in one person should stimulate a like potential development in others; but if in addition to the goodness, we must believe also in the perfection in judgment and undeviating wisdom of conduct, the expansive power of the goodness is handicapped and instead of its becoming a stimulating agency for devotion and loyalty to the highest and best, a kind of subserviency is engendered which kills initiative. In other words, we wrap ourselves in the cloaks of other people's good deeds and do not "launch our own Mayflower." "Conform, conform," is the cry of all such feeling; but "be ye transformed," is the word of real salvation. I believe that all such worship of the saints helps to blind our eyes and deafens our ears to the fact that we are all called to be saints in our own day and time and not according to any pattern given in any distant mount except that which was finished upon Calvary.

That is a beautiful expression in I. Cor. 10: 4: "And did all drink the same spiritual drink: for they drank of a spiritual rock that followed them: and the rock was Christ." How true this could have been of that motley horde of men and women traveling through the desert of Sin, we cannot know; but we do know that not from any bygone Meribah can we find refreshment. The rock from which the living waters flow is that ever-present Christ, who was the central theme of the early Friends; and if we are real believers in the teaching of George Fox, we know of a power which travels with His people,—sometimes as a pillar of cloud, sometimes as a pillar of fire, leading out of old error into truth, arousing the conscience of a nation or of a community against every form of wrong and oppression by bringing to light now one dark deed, now another, and calling to the people as of old: "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve. If Jehovah be God, follow him; and if Baal, then follow him."

Guilford College, North Carolina, April 21, 1914.

The Federal Council of Churches has issued an invitation to the churches of America to observe Sunday, May 17, as international peace and arbitration day. It is announced that last year about 25,000 peace sermons were preached, and the hope is expressed that this number will be increased to 75,000 this year. Further information can be secured by addressing Charles S. Macfarland, 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York City.

The Sixth Annual Conference of the National Association for the advancement of the colored people will be held in Baltimore, May 3-5. Both white and colored speakers are announced and subjects will be discussed ranging from the care of the colored children and the delinquent women to the future of the civil war amendments and the scope of the new abolitionism for which the association stands.

THE GENERAL SECRETARY

Financing the Work of the Church

IV. THE ANNUAL BUDGET

"Which of you, desiring to build a tower, doth not first sit down and count the cost, whether he have wherewith to complete it?" By this question Jesus places His divine sanction upon intelligent forethought as an essential factor in business affairs. The wise man, before embarking in a business undertaking will see to it that the money is on hand or in sight for carrying it through to a finish. Though it be nothing of more consequence than a peasant's rude watch-tower in a vineyard or garden, the first step is to reckon the cost of the completed structure. If it is to cost little it will be of little worth. If it is to be of substantial and permanent value for its intended purpose its cost will inevitably be commensurately great.

This primary lesson, when carried into the realm of constructive work in the Church, we Friends, as a denomination, need to take seriously to heart. A member whose wise leadership has long been recognized throughout one of our Yearly Meetings, in a recent letter to the General Secretary, said, "The Friends Church is not small because it has been wanting in great principles and truths that the world needs. Its smallness today is largely due to its inadequate business methods." To this cogent reason for our arrested denominational development another must here be added, and that is our inadequate conception of the financial cost that is absolutely unavoidable in the prosecution of Christian service that is to exert any worthy influence upon the world about us.

If every Monthly Meeting, small and large, in the Five Years Meeting were to get the tower-builder's viewpoint and adopt his business policy it would be a distinct advance toward the adequate financing of our church work. Some Monthly Meetings in different parts of the country have already done so, and uniformly with gratifying results, so far as they have been reported. Details differ, but in a general way they pursue some such method as the following. Prior to the beginning of a new financial year, through a judicious committee, a comprehensive estimate is made of the whole range of financial calls which its own work and the claims of the church-work at large are likely to make upon the Monthly Meeting during the coming twelve months. Of these amounts a budget is made and steps are taken without delay for raising it by pledges to be paid as the year goes by and the work proceeds. No hard and fast rule can be laid down as to just what items should be included in this budget by any particular meeting. Under ordinary church conditions and circumstances it will probably be found best to have it cover (1) all regular local expenses, such as pastoral support, if the meeting is served by a pastor, janitor service, light, heat and repairs; (2) Quarterly and Yearly Meeting apportionments; (3) contributions to all the large activities of the denomination which are under the charge of the various Boards of the Yearly Meeting and Five Years Meeting, care being exercised that no one of these Boards is neglected in the budget.

What has been said of the importance of the budget in the financial operations of the Monthly Meeting applies with equal or greater force to Quarterly and Yearly Meetings. The efficient working of the plan in business meetings of the one grade is in a measure dependent upon its adoption by the meetings of other grades. In line with this interdependence, New York Yearly Meeting last year appointed a committee to advise Quarterly and Monthly Meetings on the raising of the amount of the budget and to make a study of the operation of the budget system and its effect upon the several meetings and the Yearly Meeting. Subsequent to the adjournment of the Yearly Meeting a supplemental circular of instructions was sent out, signed by the Clerk of the Yearly Meeting and the Clerk of the Permanent Board, from which the following extracts are taken. "The following budget for the activities of the Yearly Meeting was adopted. [Here is entered a list of the several amounts designated for the Yearly Meeting Boards, those of the Five Years Meeting, and for Oakwood Seminary.] The Finance Committee of each Monthly Meeting is charged with the duty of personally submitting this budget to each resident member and of obtaining his or her subscription thereto. They shall also submit the same by letter to each non-resident member with a request for a subscription. * * * Subscriptions are to be paid by Fourth month next [i. e., in advance of the Yearly Meeting which convenes in May, thus making all money provided for in the budget available at the beginning of the financial year.] The total amount thus raised will be apportioned to the various interests by the Yearly Meeting."

It is to be observed that the budget of a Monthly Meeting will of necessity include its apportionments of the budgets of the Quarterly and Yearly Meetings, and that the collections of the budgets of the superior meetings will be made through the Monthly Meetings. These conditions would necessitate a change in the date of the beginning of the financial year of most, if not all our Yearly Meetings. New England Yearly Meeting, which comes in June, met this requirement last year by the adoption of a recommendation coming from its Finance Committee that the financial year of its meetings be made to correspond to the financial year, and that the Monthly Meetings report through their regular channels to the Yearly Meeting the amounts pledged by the new pledge and envelope system for the several departments of their work for the year 1914.

The attempts at reforming their financial systems which these two Yearly Meetings have undertaken will be watched with interest by the Church at large. It may well be hoped that they will be so successful that they will prove to be the beginnings of a general movement which will eventually result in the adoption of the budget plan of raising money throughout the limits of the Five Years Meeting.

Pressing On

BY L. RICHARD DEAN

"Some element of struggle must always be implied in all spiritual life that is lived under human conditions." (Rudolf Eucken in "The Meaning and Value of Life.") This quotation gives rise to a long chain of reflections. No doubt many say, "How true that is." But such sentiments usually come from those whose course is nearly run. Young life seldom pauses to consider the immensity of the problem of life. And when it does reflect, discouragement often results at the thought of the difficulty of living the spiritual life.

Yet just here is the mighty summons which lays hold upon the strong man at the outset of life. To such a man there is no other life worth the living, except the spiritual. What does it matter because someone said it involved struggle? Struggle is a word to call him from idleness or despondency. Struggle is all about him; he cannot escape it if he wished. Many are the emotions which center about this idea. In the world of science, the "struggle for existence" has become a commonplace phrase. In the realm of material interests, "the struggle" means seeking after the things which perish with the using.

"But with the things of the Spirit, surely you cannot say that we must struggle for these,—ask and ye shall receive." Let us not be deceived by these comforting words. Indeed, we do receive, but further possession calls into play a struggle to retain these gifts of the Spirit unspotted from the world.

The pages of the Bible are filled with the comparison of life to a contest and these are familiar to all. Spiritual life under human conditions holds out to everyone who enters upon it the daily struggle to preserve in his life the true Christian life. "Well-nigh impossible," does some one say? True enough, if we had to undertake the battle alone. But if we never make the attempt, we shall never feel the Helper.

Struggle does not always imply daily victory, for the human conditions sometimes seem to be carrying back in spite of all that we can do. Yet in the end we attain more and more of the spiritual life. To live becomes simpler. Our struggle receives its glorious prize of triumph.

To the man who values the things of the Spirit, the very difficulty of the conquest makes them all the more desirable, and he exults in the attainment and possession of the spiritual life, which crowns his struggle.

Federal Council and Mexico

The Commission on Peace and Arbitration of the Federal Council of Churches has issued the following statement under date of April 21:

We, representatives of the federated forces of seventeen million Christians in the United States, desire to put on record our steadfast friendship for the Mexican people, and to express our sympathy with them in the disorders which now trouble their country. That a way out of their distresses may be found is our earnest and constant hope. We wish them prosperity and peace.

We wish further to express our conviction that the thought of war between Mexico and the United States is abhorrent to the vast majority of our people. The citizens of our Republic want no war with our southern neighbor, nor do they desire to dominate it, or to interfere with its internal affairs, but on the other hand they desire cordial relations and friendly intercourse.

We rejoice that in our President and our Secretary of State we have men who are lovers of peace, and whose purpose it is to maintain peace, if at all possible, not only with Mexico but with all the nations of the earth. That the purpose of our President and his Councillors shall be carried out is not only our hope, but our confident expectation.

We wish to assure our representatives and senators at Washington that the voices clamoring for war do not represent the sentiment of the sane and substantial people of our Republic, and we would remind them that the few newspapers which would hurry the government to extreme measures are voicing the wishes, not of patriotic and disinterested citizens, but of mischiefmakers and of certain vested interests whose aggrandizement is furthered by war.

"Blessed are the peacemakers"—so we believe—and we are confident that the glory of the present administration will be enhanced and its fame augmented, not by the slaughter of tens of thousands of the young men of the two republics, but by the peaceful solution of a difficult and vexing problem, by the forbearance and long-suffering and calm wisdom of a Christian statesmanship.

Signed by Members of the Commission.

Quaker Pioneers

Under the above heading the New York Independent some months ago had a readable article including a book notice of Charles F. Holder's "The Quakers in Great Britain and America." We present the article not so much for the sake of the book notice as for the material which it contains of interest to Friends generally.

Much has been done in recent years to give its due place in English and American history to the Society of Friends. The Beginnings of Quakerism in England have been well described by William C. Braithwaite, and Dr. Rufus M. Jones has written with scholarly care on the Quakers in the American Colonies. Mr. Charles F. Holder, however, in his book The Quakers in Great Britain and in America has written a more complete and comprehensive history than any previously in existence. He tells what they were and what they endured in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries; and how they and their doctrines and ideals have permeated social life in England and America. It will be a surprise to many readers to learn how much of leadership the Society of Friends has given to the world; and how many of the honored names of English and American history belong either to Quakers, or to men and women of direct Quaker descent.

Mr. Holder justly claims for the Friends that they were the pioneers in granting equality to women, in opposing slavery and the slave trade, in the temperance movement and in the championship of peace. The Quakers have an honorable place in the roll of inventors, manufacturers, engineers, bankers, educators, statesmen and philanthropists. Among the more recent Quakers who have helped to make history, Mr. Holder enumerates, for England, John Bright and W. E. Forster; Lord Lister, the surgeon; Sir Samuel Cunard, the ship-owner; and Neal Dow, the temperance reformer. In America the list is long and substantial. In it Mr. Holder gives first place to Mrs. Russell Sage who, like himself, is descended from Christopher Holder, one of the boldest and ablest Quaker leaders of the seventeenth century. There is much in the volume that will be useful to genealogists, for the Quakers kept careful records and their families were large and of a strong vitality. Mr. Holder seems to have missed the Quaker birthright of mysticism, and to have an inadequate comprehension of the meaning of the "Light Within" by which the Quakers guided their way, but he has a hearty appreciation of the lofty morality and the true religion that have always characterized the Society of Friends.

A Lesson in Punctuality

(CONTRIBUTED)

Someone has said that "Punctuality is the politeness of princes," and another in writing of the duties of the guests in a home calls it the "hall-mark of a lady or gentleman."

Yet how many feel it their privilege as guests to take their ease in the morning, ignoring the family breakfast hour, even when informed of it, thus greatly inconveniencing the hostess, who having carefully prepared her breakfast, desires to serve it at its best! Especially trying is this at Quarterly Meeting times, when as is not uncommon, the mistress of the house does her own work and has not only to put her house in order and get ready for the meeting, but to make some preparation for the guests whom she hopes to entertain at dinner.

I have heard a somewhat outspoken woman say she thought she should hardly care to have an angel in the house if he habitually kept meals waiting. Perhaps we should not all express ourselves so strongly, but it does seem that any one who is not very old or very feeble could rise in time to partake of a meal that the hostess had risen early enough to prepare.

A Plea for the Retired Minister

(CONTRIBUTED)

Who does not love and reverence the old time Friends' minister? How often when a child we sat and listened to the messages as they were given in the power of the Holy Ghost! How our hearts burned within us as they spoke of the possibilities of complete triumph over sin in this life, or portrayed the glories of the world to come! Their power and influence for good, no one can measure. Many of these dear saints have faithfully served their day, finished their work and fallen asleep, to await the resurrection of the just. But some remain with us.

It is for these, who are yet with us, I wish to make an appeal. Are we giving them the love and tenderness due them as our spiritual fathers and mothers? What are we doing for them in a financial way? Many of them labored hard amidst family cares and burdens, making many a sacrifice about which no one knew but God, that the Kingdom of Heaven might be advanced, and all this with little or no compensation. Some of these are now worn out in the service, not able to continue, and left with scarcely any visible means of support.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Problem of Finance

I am truly glad in my heart that Friends are being awakened to the fact that we need a better system of raising Church funds. I have been very much concerned for some time about the meager way in which Friends were giving to the support of the Church.

Several years ago I became dissatisfied with my offerings to the Church, and I set about to see if I could find a better method of giving. I soon found a solution to the problem which proved very satisfactory to me and I have had peace of mind ever since I have been practicing it. This is the system: I tithe all the money that comes into my possession from my business, laying aside one-tenth. Then I make weekly offerings from that fund. I am giving more than ten times what I was before I adopted this system, and I have always had the money and could pay in advance if need be.

I make the assertion that if all the members of Western Yearly Meeting would practice tithing, we would have thousands of dollars to carry on the Lord's work that we don't have; and what is true of one yearly meeting would be true of another. I am so well pleased with this plan I could say much about it, but will say I believe it is the solution of the financial problem of our Church.

AUBREY F. DE LON.

Kokomo, Indiana.

The Anti-Saloon League has announced that beginning with next December a new daily paper will be installed at Washington City, whose object it will be primarily to promote the campaign for national prohibition. It will be a cheap, four-page illustrated fighting paper and plans have been made to give it an immediate circulation of 100,000 copies. The price will be only $2.00 per year. $50,000 has already been subscribed and $50,000 more is in sight for the project.

On April 21st another dry county was added to the list in Illinois, making 53 in all, out of 102 counties, that have no saloons. Ninety-three additional saloons were closed by this last vote. The temperance forces are now striving for a county option law.

"If we were children of Pentecost, living up to our spiritual times, heart's-ease would bloom just within our gate, and the weary wayfarer would be stopped by its perfume, and would question us as to the secret and manner of its growth."—J. W. Jowett.

Current Items of Interest to Friends

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING

West Milton, Ohio.—We are glad to report our meeting in a healthy and growing condition. The different committees on church work are doing excellent service. We are also looking forward to the Yearly Meeting's Christian Endeavor Convention and committees have been appointed who are getting busy, arranging for the success and comfort of all who are in attendance.

IOWA YEARLY MEETING

Pleasant Plain.—A series of meetings began at Hopewell meeting house March 18, continuing nearly three weeks. Services were conducted by the pastor, Samuel Jackson, assisted by Alvin Hoskins, both pastors in Richland Monthly Meeting, and Miss Elva Jackson, of Oskaloosa, as singer. The work was strenuous and interesting from the beginning. The Lord was present to save and thirty-seven conversions and renewals are given as the definite results of the meetings, which closed about midnight on the night of April 7th.

Walnut Creek.—A revival meeting began at Walnut Creek, a country meeting belonging to Pleasant Plain Monthly Meeting, March 5th, and continued until the 22d. The pastor, G. A. Deshler, was assisted by Linton Johnson, of Martinsburg, as evangelist. God honored His word from the beginning, and conviction seized the hearts of the sinners. Forty-nine souls found pardon and peace. Many confessions were made and old wrongs were straightened up. For several weeks the Church had been praying for a revival and asking the Lord that the right messenger might be sent, and we believe the Lord heard in both instances. As a Church we are grateful to God for sending Brother Johnson this way. A number have requested membership with us, and more will follow. To Him be all the praise.

Indianola.—At the regular Monthly Meeting of Sunday School teachers, held in December, it was decided to appoint April 5th as Decision Day. Through the combined efforts of the pastor, Charles Moore, the Superintendent, Jesse Eno, and the several teachers working to this end, the day was one of marked success. Letters of invitation were sent to each family which had children in the school. Prayer meetings were often held after Sabbath morning services and through the personal efforts of many, there were two hundred present on that day. The service was very impressive and several young people and children responded to the invitation, resulting in twenty conversions. Thus through the united effort of church and Sunday School, thirty-six requested membership and ten associate members desired to become active.

Minneapolis, Minnesota.—Our Easter Sunday School program was a marked success in both quality and attendance. Many spoke of it as the best the Sunday School has ever given. Edward Jones, Minnie Truman, May Rogers and Bessie Albertson were appointed by the last Monthly Meeting as a correspondence committee, to keep the meeting in touch with non-resident members, many of whom are widely scattered throughout the north-west. Edith Jones, Superintendent of the primary department of our Sunday School, attended the recent convention of the State Sunday School Association at Winona, Minnesota, where she led the primary round table discussion and gave an exhibit of original hand work used in the Minneapolis Friends' Sunday School. The April meeting of the Quakerism Study Class was led by Professor William O. Beal, of the Minnesota State University. The subject for the evening was "Quakers I Have Known." Mr. Beal and others spoke of the lives and characters of such recent Quaker leaders as Jacob Baker, Elizabeth Comstock, Laura Haviland, Dougan Clark, Joseph Moore and Allen Jay.

As a result of the church going campaign in this city, inaugurated about March 1, our attendance at the Sunday morning service has been increased about thirty per cent. This campaign of careful planning and organized effort, combined with a real concern for a spiritual awakening of the community, has stirred the hearts and minds of the people and there is every indication that the results will be permanent.

NEW YORK YEARLY MEETING

Millbrook.—At the Millbrook Friends' Church Easter was observed as Decision Day. Eleven of the young people of the Sabbath School made public profession of Christ, and all, at the Monthly Meeting held later in the week, united with the Church.

Milton.—Cornwall Quarterly Meeting was held at Milton, New York, April 15th and 16th. At the meeting on Ministry and Oversight on Wednesday afternoon, William J. Sayers, of Poughkeepsie, gave an address on "Developing Personality." In the afternoon he gave an address on the subject of "Peace." At the meeting for worship on Thursday morning, S. Adelbert Wood, of New England, and Mr. Sayers brought the messages. Following a luncheon at the noon hour various committees met at one o'clock and the members re-convened in the meeting for business at 1:30. Monthly Meeting was held immediately after the adjournment of the Marlborough Quarterly Meeting.

Poughkeepsie.—The Monthly Meeting was held on the evening of April 16th. Professor S. R. Shear, Superintendent of schools, gave a fine address on "The Attitude of the Members toward the Church." During the business session which followed one member was received.

WESTERN YEARLY MEETING

Westfield.—Easter services were appropriately rendered in our regular forenoon meeting on April 12th in the singing of suitable hymns and a service of prayer, followed by pertinent remarks by our assistant pastor, Jane D. H. Moore. On Sunday evening the time was given to the rendition of a beautiful cantata, which set forth the joys and hopes of the resurrection in all its fullness and power. On the 19th, President Robert L. Kelly, of Earlham College, preached a strong sermon from Luke 2: 52, in which he set forth the intellectual, the physical and the spiritual development of the child Jesus into that perfect and symmetrical manhood, which helped to prepare him as the "Son of Man" as well as the "Son of God" for the work which He came to accomplish in the salvation of a lost world.

The Friends and community of Westfield have been deprived for some time of the services of our worthy pastor, George H. Moore, who has been suffering from an attack of the grippe for about a month. While he now appears to be convalescing, it will be some time, at best, before he can be able to resume his pastoral and other church duties. He is still confined to his room under the care of a physician. While we deeply regret his illness and pray for his speedy recovery, we are impressed with the thought that his numerous friends, who are so anxious about his condition, had best refrain from letter writing for the present, so as to give our friend the undisturbed opportunity for rest and recovery. This caution will also apply to the writing of business letters as well. The various services of the meeting are well cared for by his faithful wife, who, with occasional help from local and visiting ministers, has kept the interest in our meetings from lagging. In this connection, Brother Moore expresses his gratification and thanks for the loyal support so fully rendered all this time by the membership of the meeting.

CONFERENCE OF MEN

The following communications will indicate something of the continued interest in the proposed Conference of men. They are self explanatory.

LYNNVILLE, IOWA, April 10, 1914.

I cannot refrain from giving expression to my appreciation of your editorial on the proposed Men's Conference, in the issue of April 8th. It is most timely. The outcome of this question is of tremendous importance. If we fail in it we shall lose tremendously. I know young men who are awaiting the outcome, and upon it largely hangs their future relation to the Friends' Church. They feel that time is too precious to stand still with no definite policy.

ZENO H. DOAN.

GUILFORD COLLEGE, N. C.,
April 20, 1914.

I note with interest your last two editorials. They are the most convincing of any as to the need of a Men's Conference. I think it is much needed and believe we shall sustain a great loss if we do not have it. We must go forward or we cannot keep from going backward. The greatest need, I think, is an overwhelming wave of evangelism that will result in conversions.

F. S. BLAIR.

THE TRIENNIAL CONFERENCE

A most earnest and cordial invitation is extended to all missionaries who can arrange to be present during the sessions of the Conference at Muncie.

CHARLOTTE E. VICKERS,
President W. F. M. Union.

The Ministerial Conference of Western Yearly Meeting will be held at Plainfield, Indiana, May 5th and 6th. For entertainment, write to E. James Carter.

PERSONAL MENTION

Sylvester Newlin, pastor of Friends' Meeting at Pasadena, California, was recently interviewed by a writer for one of the local papers, and in a column of space set forth fully the tenets and work of Friends.

William J. Sayres, pastor at Poughkeepsie, New York, spent a week recently at Guilford College, North Carolina, holding special meetings with the men. A number decided to become Christians. He had charge of the chapel services each morning, and also spoke to the girl students under the auspices of the Y. W. C. A.

Edwin McGrew has resigned his pastorate of the meeting at Whittier, California, with the request that the resignation take effect not later than May 1st. Last summer he spent some time in a Philadelphia hospital for the treatment of his eyes. This, together with the fact that his wife is an invalid, caused him to lighten his work.

Lindley A. Wells, of Portland, Oregon, is engaged in revival work at Wabash, Indiana, with Miss Leora Bogue, of Fairmount, Indiana, leading the singing. His meetings will close there on May 3d, and he will finish his work in Indiana in a series of meetings at Upland, May 7 to 24. Robert Morris of Taylor University will be the singing evangelist. Lindley Wells will spend May 31st at Rose Hill, Kansas, and will reach his home on June 5th in time for Oregon Yearly Meeting.

EVERY-MEMBER CANVASS

The Friends' Meeting at Poughkeepsie, New York, W. J. Sayres, pastor, has just completed an every-member canvass. Ten teams of two men each spent a recent Sabbath afternoon in calling upon the members. The pledges of financial support were doubled and all entered heartily in carrying out the plan.

The West Richmond Friends' Meeting, Indiana, has taken up the every-member canvass. On Sabbath afternoon, April 19th, eleven teams of two men each called upon the membership and secured pledges for current expenses and for foreign missions. Every member of each family was encouraged to pledge something and the results are highly encouraging.

East Main Street Friends' Meeting, at Richmond, Indiana, completed an every-member canvass a few weeks ago. The results were encouraging and contributions for foreign missions showed a large increase.

ALL NATURE PROVES THERE IS A GOD

BY NATHAN COSAND

Each leaf that clothes with verdure
The waving forest o'er,
Each breeze that sweeps the ocean
When wild waves lash the shore.

Each note the songster warbles
In sunshine or in shade,
Each flower that meekly lifts its head
In modest tints arrayed.

Each rippling stream that murmurs,
Softly gliding along,
Each dewdrop as it glistens
The tender grass upon

Each golden head of rip'ning grain
Bowed by the summer breeze,
Each cluster of delicious fruit
That loads the autumn trees.

Each star that sheds its gentle light
As darkness gathers round,
Each pine upon the mountain's height
With lasting verdure crowned.

All, all proclaim a sovereign hand
That rules and reigns supreme,
Whose skill this spacious structure

Where living millions teem.

BEAR THE BURDEN OF THE HOUR

LIZZIE DE ARMOND

Bear the burden of the hour,
Let the others pass along;
With our duty fully done,
Life should be a happy song.
We must take with willing hands
What each passing moment brings,
Satisfied to do our best
For the mighty King of kings.

Just a little ev'ry day,
Striving bravely to fulfill
Things we know that God has planned,
Working out His holy will.
Use the present moment right,
Striving only just to do
What is pleasing in His sight,
And He'll surely help us through.

Bear the burden of the hour.
Ah! we have not long to wait;
Just beyond, a little way,
Opens wide the pearly gate.
One may walk in easy paths,
But the rugged road is best;
'Tis the way our Saviour trod
To the mansions of the blest.

CORRESPONDENCE

SAFFRON, WALDEN, ENGLAND,
January, 1914.

To the Editor of The American Friend:

Dear Friend—At a time when the question of peace is arousing more wide-spread and intelligent interest than perhaps ever before, there seems to be a real opportunity for a clear statement of the position of Friends, which might be of service not only to the Society but to a wider public. At present, by the selection of the Woodbrooke Extension Committee and the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, I am engaged in research into the history of our public principles and practice from the days of George Fox to modern times, with the aim of producing such a statement in book form.

The field is wide, the material widely scattered, and not only collection but also selection will be necessary, but my work will be greatly lightened and its value enhanced if I can gain the help of all Friends interested in the subject. Two methods of help already suggest themselves to me:

1. Could Clerks or others examining old records, inform me of any early unpublished instances of the statement of peace principles of Friends, of their sufferings under this head, or of their influence on others outside our body? If necessary, I should be glad to arrange for copies to be made of such records.

2. Could any Friend who at any time, in the course of his or her general reading, comes across striking and unacknowledged matter bearing on the question, send me a postcard giving the exact reference?

I am, of course, using to the best of my ability the stories of the Reference Library at Devonshire House, but neither there or elsewhere can I hope to cover the field unaided.

Yours sincerely,

MARGARET E. HIRST.

SPECIAL NOTICE

New York Yearly Meeting occurs at Union Springs, New York, from Fifth month 26th to 31st inclusive. Friends desiring to arrange for board and lodging should address Walter H. Wood, Oakwood Seminary, Union Springs, New York.

Died

Coffin.—Ella C. Coffin died at her home in Oskaloosa, Iowa, April 6, 1914. While always in frail health, she accomplished a great deal in pastoral, evangelistic and other lines of gospel service in the twenty-eight years of her ministry. When she was not able physically to take part actively in public, her prayers for all interests were constant and earnest. The new meeting house at Oskaloosa was one of the things most vitally in her thought during the last months, and as a member of the building committee she made it a subject of continual prayer. She is survived by her husband and four sons.

Davis.—Eliza M., wife of J. Augustus Davis, was born in Parsonsfield, Missouri, and died in Amesbury, Massachusetts, April 2, 1914, in her sixty-second year. She moved to Amesbury in early life. She was a devoted homemaker and her earnest Christian life and words of love and sympathy endeared her to a large circle of acquaintances in the meeting and the community. A husband and two daughters survive her.

Haworth.—John F. Haworth was born in Hamilton County, Indiana, October 1, 1840, and died near McLouth, Kansas, April 13, 1914, aged seventy-three years six months and thirteen days. He was a birthright Friend and had a bright and clear conversion at the age of twenty-three years. He lived a faithful Christian life. He married Louisa M. Thornton in 1862. He was a member of Stanwood Monthly Meeting, Springdale Quarter, Kansas.

Kirk.—Samuel T. Kirk was born in Union County, Indiana, March 5, 1838, and died at his home in Kokomo, Indiana, April 11, 1914. He was a birthright Friend and clung to his Church with unflinching devotion. He was a Bible School teacher for a third of a century, and was the founder of the Courtland Avenue Friends' Meeting. He was one of the foremost men of his city and state. For years he was recognized as the leader of Indiana's dental circle; for nineteen years, a member of the state board of medical examiners, and for four years its president. He frequently lectured before dental societies. He leaves a wife and two children.

Kearns.—Charles E. Kearns, son of O. W. and Mary B. Kearns, was born in Hancock County, Indiana, April 15, 1875, and died at Rose Valley, Kansas, March 14, 1914, aged thirty-eight years ten months and twenty-four days, following a brief illness of pneumonia. He was a birthright Friend and at the age of eleven years gave his heart to God. He was very conscientious, always preferring others to himself. In 1906 he married Mary Addie Worrell, and in the fall of the same year moved to Pratt County, Kansas, where they engaged in pastoral work. In the fall of 1909 they came to Stevens County, Kansas, where he and his wife, a minister of the gospel, accepted the pastoral work of Rose Valley Monthly Meeting, and their services have been much appreciated by the church and vicinity. As he faced death he seemed to get a glimpse of another world and exclaimed, "I didn't know it could be so delightful." He leaves a wife, two little girls, an aged mother, one sister and two brothers.

Pickett.—Phoebe Pickett, wife of Richard Pickett, was born in Henry County, Iowa, June 17, 1842, and died near McLouth, Kansas, April 13, 1914, aged seventy-one years nine months and twenty-six days. She was married to Richard Pickett in 1862. She was a birthright Friend and was converted at the age of twelve years. She was a member of Stanwood Monthly Meeting at the time of her death. She is survived by five sons and one daughter.

Scott.—Lois Margret Scott, eldest daughter of Thomas L. and Lydia A. Scott, died at their home at Indianapolis, Indiana, March 14, 1914, aged fifteen years five months and five days. She was a member of Indianapolis First Friends' Church, a dear, sweet child whom everyone loved. Her life was short but beautifully lived for those she loved.

Wilson.—Harold Hoge Wilson, son of Franklin P. and Elizabeth H. Wilson, died at their home in Washington, D. C., April 9, 1914, in his seventeenth year. Funeral services were held in Washington on April 11, and Lincoln, Virginia, April 12th. Burial was at Lincoln, Virginia.

Woodard.—Milican Woodward died at his home in Plainfield, Indiana, March 24, 1914, in his seventy-seventh year. He has filled several important positions in the local church in Plainfield Meeting. In the home and community, as well as in the church, he fulfilled his obligations in a conscientious manner and was a man highly respected by all who knew him.

HAVERFORD COLLEGE

THE addition of a Professor of Social Work to the Faculty of Haverford College in a sense rounds out a department which has most to do with the development of scholars who wish to appreciate or join in the movement towards effective Christian activities.

Such scholars will not all be ministers, though some of them may. They may not give their whole lives to efforts for humanity, though some of them may. But as business or professional men they may wish to understand the religious and social problems of the day and aid those who more fully occupy themselves with their solution.

The subject will be taught by Rufus M. Jones in Philosophy, Henry J. Cadbury in Biblical Literature, and Frank D. Watson in Social Work. Dr. Watson comes from the New York School of Philanthropy, where he has held the position of Professor of Social Economics. From both the practical and scientific side and from his qualities as a man and as a teacher he is amply qualified to create and satisfy a large interest in the various phases of social reorganization, and the duty of the educated man in this direction.

The other opportunities of Haverford College in English, Economics, History, the Languages and Sciences are open to students of this department.

BIBLE SCHOOL LESSON

MAY 10

SUBJECT—The Unjust Steward.

LESSON—Luke 16: 1-13.

GOLDEN TEXT—He that is faithful in a very little is faithful also in much: and he that is unrighteous in a very little is unrighteous also in much.—Luke 16: 10.

TIME—January, A. D. 30.

PLACE—Perea.

Some of the greatest truths which Jesus taught were set forth in parables. For the same reason an object lesson is more forceful oftentimes than exposition.

Today's lesson is one of the most perplexing that Jesus ever gave to His disciples. It will be easy to fall into the error of thinking that unrighteousness is commended.

It will be noted that the Lord does not condone the previous acts of the unjust steward, and that he was not restored to his former place. The servant is still the unrighteous steward and the commendation goes no further than to recognize that he has done wisely for himself in making friends of those who would be in position to help him.

Some one has said that "the key to the meaning of the parable lies in the use of what is called the argument a fortiori." "If a dishonest steward, misusing his master's money, nevertheless craftily provides for his future, how much more should the followers of Christ, entrusted by God with wealth of many kinds, use it benevolently and thereby provide heavenly friends and rewards for themselves."—S. S. World. Farrar says that "the master of the steward approved of this dexterity, not of his fraudulence."

This is a lesson against the unfaithful exercise of one's stewardship. This particular man was wasteful of his lord's resources, and his disloyalty lost him his position. He who does that cannot be trusted with the "true riches." He who is not faithful in using that which belongs to others, cannot be entrusted to take care of that which belongs to himself.

If humanity will work as zealously to provide for the future life as the servant worked to keep himself out of the ranks of the day laborer, all the world will reap the blessings of faithful discipleship.

MINISTERIAL ASSOCIATION

The Ministerial Association of Indiana Yearly Meeting will hold its annual session at Ludlow Falls, Ohio, May 20-22. It is earnestly desired that the ministers throughout the Yearly Meeting arrange to be present. An excellent program will be carried out. Those desiring to attend the Christian Endeavor Convention at West Milton, two miles away, can make their arrangements accordingly, as the Christian Endeavor Convention begins in the evening following the adjournment of the Ministerial Association at noon of the 22d.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR

MAY 10

TOPIC—Health Hints for Better Living.—1 Cor. 6: 19, 20. (Led by a Christian Physician.)

While spiritual health and bodily health may not be synonymous, the former will find its greatest usefulness in association with the latter.

Dissipation is inconsistent with soul health. The body is the temple of the Holy Ghost. Pure food and clean living are elements that contribute to the usefulness of the Christian life.

The bad air of the tumble-down tenement house is not conducive to spiritual growth. Late hours and the whirl of un-Godly society do not promote Christian fellowship.

Environment has much to do with religious experience. The saloon is not a place in which to promote Christian fellowship.

Let the leader assign questions to various members designed to emphasize the importance of a healthy soul in a sound body.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR CONVENTION

The annual meeting of the Indiana Yearly Meeting Christian Endeavor Union will be held at West Milton, Ohio, May 22d to 24th. Delegates are expected from all the local meetings in the Yearly Meeting. Vital subjects have been selected by the Program Committee, and the following are announced as among the speakers: Ellison R. Purdy, Wilmington, Ohio; Milo Hinckle, Lynn, Indiana; Richard Haworth, Fairmount, Indiana; Raymond Holding, Spiceland, Indiana; Professor W. O. Mendenhall, Professor Elbert Russell and S. E. Nicholson, of Richmond, Indiana. Names of delegates should be sent at once to Ethel Faulkner, West Milton, Ohio.

400,000 Settlers a Year

Immigration figures show that the population of Canada increased during 1913, by the addition of 400,000 new settlers from the United States and Europe. Most of these have gone on farms in provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Lord William Percy, an English Nobleman, says:

"The possibilities and opportunities offered by the Canadian West are so infinitely greater than those which exist in England, that it seems absurd to think that people should be impeded from coming to the country where they can most easily and certainly improve their position."

New districts are being opened up, which will make accessible a great number of homesteads in districts especially adapted to mixed farming and grain raising.

Because of its nearness to Philadelphia it is surrounded by a large group of devoted friends who are continually helping the School, and bringing to it their religious concerns, and their interest in the

THE STORY OF QUAKERISM

BY ELIZABETH BRAITHWAITE EMMOTT
(Daughter of J. Bevan Braithwaite)

Notwithstanding this book was first printed in 1908, and has had two re-prints, it has not become as well known generally among Friends in this country at least as it deserves to be. It is a little history (a story) of Quakerism, but it contains a vast amount of most interesting material,—chief features of this large subject,—and it reads like a most interesting narrative.

The author possesses a clear conception of what she has written about; she is pleasing in her style and clear in her expression. The book is particularly adapted to the use of young Friends, and it is doubtful if as a text-book for Quakerism Study Classes it is excelled.

The chapters on what Friends in England are doing at home and abroad, and on the outlook of Friends both in England and in America, are well worth careful reading by everybody interested in the Society.

The book has a valuable appendix including General Advices and Queries, a chronological outline, a list of authorities (books specially advised), and a good Index. It contains near 300 pages; price $1.35. It may be obtained of Walter H. Jenkins, Fifteenth and Cherry Streets, Philadelphia, and doubtless of other dealers in Friends' books.

CALVARY

By C. W. E. SIEGEL

Far and wide my thoughts have wandered Viewed the mirrored ages vast;
'Mid historic scenes have pondered,
Learned the lessons of the past;
But no heights of sacred Story,—
Gospel mount, or mount of Law,
Classic pile, or ruins hoary,—
Filled me with such holy awe,
As the hill of Calvary,
Where my Saviour died for me.

Not with grander heights it shareth
Crowns of gold and rosy light,
Nor like Virgin Alp it wearth
Wedding-garb of purest white;
Yet from earth so high uplifted,
Nearer Heaven I ne'er could rise,
Than upon this earthquake-rifted,
Blood-stained mount of sacrifice,
Love's high altar, Calvary,
Where my Saviour died for me.

Here no pomp and power of nations
Blinds the eye, ensnares the mind;
Fame and fortune, lofty stations,
Here the worldling shall not find;
But all earthly glory faded,
When I saw that noble brow,
Crowned with thorns, despised and hated,—
Heard the cry, "'Tis finished now!"
From the Cross of Calvary,
Where my Saviour died for me.

Hither come, ye pilgrims weary,
Rest beneath this holy shade;
From the path all hopeless, dreary,
Turn and seek the Saviour's aid;
Here our burdened hearts, dejected,
By redeeming Grace shall rise,
For the home-road, Heaven-directed,
Forward the new-won Paradise,
Leads across Mount Calvary,
Where my Saviour died for me.

Pasadena Quakerism Class

Dear Friends:

The class for the study of Friends' History and Doctrine of the First Friends Church of Pasadena, California, greets the New York Quakerism Class and other groups in America. This class had its inception last year at a business meeting of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor, held in the Friends Church in Pasadena. The visit of Carolena Wood of New York, to California Yearly Meeting in 1913, did much to help some of us get started in the work, with helpful suggestions and plans for the establishing of classes.

Our study group did not really get under way until the first of this year, but once started it has been held regularly ever since. We meet every other Monday evening at 7:30, and have adopted a course of study that is used in New York Yearly Meeting. We have had an average attendance of twelve with as high as twenty. Usually we meet in the church parlor, but have had our class in the homes of some of the members, when the social aspect has been more fully emphasized, light refreshments being served before going home.

We feel quite infantile in comparison to the New York Quakerism Class, with its history of ten years behind it, but realize that there is a great need for this work on the Pacific Coast. Taking the young people as a whole in this vicinity, they are indifferent, possibly because the claims of the work have not been pressed home closely enough, and they have not been brought to realize that a good education on the Principles and History of Friends is essential to the one who wishes in a large sense to be of service to his church. Perhaps if the group study spirit became more general in America, with it would come a larger vision, and a greater investment of time and money and lives for the cause of Christ and the Church.

In our little class are those who have come from different parts of the United States; we have the typical Western Friend, and the eastern type as well, with the resultant difference in belief and viewpoint.

Many of our aims and ideals are widely divergent, and yet we are closely united in the bond of Christian fellowship, working and striving for the same great ends, and learning from each other. Our class has not been in operation long enough to have branched out into other lines of activity, but these should come with time.

May we not through the coming days, as isolated groups, remember each other much in prayer, and fulfill the wish expressed by Bertha Ufford, that we write and tell one another of our struggles and aspirations as a means of help and uplift, either through THE AMERICAN FRIEND, or by correspondence.

Cordially yours,

JOHN W. DORLAND.

Pasadena, California.

MISCELLANEOUS

Russia appears to have awakened to the evils of alcoholism. New laws have been passed limiting the sale of vodka between the hours of 9:00 a. m. to 11:00 p. m., in cities and towns and to 6:00 p. m. in the rural districts. The sale is entirely forbidden in public places, such as government buildings, theatres, etc. "The Literary Digest" quotes the Russian press as being unanimous in their criticism of the new law on the ground that it will fail to remedy conditions. The Czar has awakened to the danger of an increase in drunkenness and has asked the new Minister of Finance to find other sources of revenue besides alcohol.

Dr. William H. Roberts, of the Evangelistic Committee of the Presbyterian General Assembly, has recently issued an interesting statement concerning the work of the Chapman-Alexander missions in Scotland during the past six months. Three meetings have been held in Glasgow and Edinburgh by Dr. Chapman since the beginning of last October, resulting in the conversion of more than 8,000 persons in Glasgow and more than 10,000 in Edinburgh. Prominent ministers unite in the declaration that Scotland has been moved spiritually as it has not been since the visit of D. L. Moody.

William G. Hubbard, a well-known Friend, now living at Sandy Lake, Pa., and superintendent of the American Railway Literary Union for the suppression of pernicious literature has issued his annual report. Among other things he says: "Our work has been carried on along much the same lines as in previous years, with much satisfaction at the evidence of the success of our work. In a trip of more than 1,000 miles eastward from Ohio, taking in all the greatest cities as far east as Boston, we found neither on trains nor book stands, any of the books we had ordered suppressed in previous years."

Friends Are Facing Great Opportunities

The Yearly Meeting season is at hand, and the record of another year is about to be written into the annals of the Society of Friends. Whether or not the record varies much from the somewhat stereotyped form of other years will determine in large measure the trend of present-day Quakerism. No doubt it is easier to follow the beaten path, but the conviction is spreading that there is a vast unexplored territory within the proper domain of Friends that awaits the coming of some heroic discoverer.

To us, the time seems overripe for a new baptism, a new inspiration, a new vision of opportunity, a new call for a higher service as the heritage of Friends both here and abroad. It is not that the old type is discredited, nor yet that there is not much of superior workmanship remaining. It is not apostasy to wish for something better or to covet the very best. Is there any one bold enough to claim that the Society of Friends is that positive, aggressive force for righteousness in the world that it ought to be? May we not even question whether or not denominationally we are keeping abreast of the average development of the modern Christian Church?

There are some stirrings in the inner consciousness of our denominational life which the Church in its collective capacity needs to heed. The organization of study groups and fellowship groups and Quakerism classes and kindred forms is but the stirring of our young people to find a place worthy of their best aspirations within the confines of our Quaker structure. Unless the Church is able soon to lay its hand lovingly and helpfully in some constructive way upon this problem, and incorporate the activities of our young people into the vital active organism of the whole body, these strivings may develop into an eruption, not through any lack of loyalty on the part of young Friends, but because of their impatience to find a place of usefulness in the field of Christian service.

Within recent weeks, visions of opportunity have been revealing themselves in various directions. A few weeks ago a company of earnest Friends on the Pacific coast became conscious of a great denominational need, and voiced their convictions in an appeal for a concerted effort to raise two millions of dollars for the support of important departments of our church activities. Inspired by the same feeling, the General Secretary is laying upon the heart of the Church the problem of adequate financial support for all our varied interests. The suggested conference of men has appealed to a large element of our membership with a positiveness that cannot be permanently ignored. This week, in a gathering that convened after these words were penned, a number of men from all parts of Western Yearly Meeting met for conference around a banquet table in Indianapolis with a feeling that "they would like to give more of their life and talent to the Friends Church."

This feeling of disquietude is indicative of life and should be welcomed. But no movement should be allowed to drift. Upon the Church rests the responsibility of consideration through prayer and Christian counsel of every tendency in the Church that betokens a desire for greater efficiency in Christian living and service. No Yearly Meeting can afford to rest satisfied with the commonplace or with the stereotyped forms of procedure. The Church must ever be an organism of life, and life means growth, and growth means fruitage. Shall we not pray that upon all our Yearly Meetings there may come a baptism of power that will mean a new birth for Quakerism, to which is brought a fresh revelation of the Father's love and guidance, and in which Christ is revealed as the vital, impelling inspiration of a mighty service for the betterment of humanity?

It is encouraging to know that Friends in England are feeling the same mighty pull toward a higher life and toward a more efficient service. In announcing a proposed autumn conference of Friends in that country "to focus the thought of the Society upon certain questions of far-reaching import for the future of the Church and the world," The London Friend of April 17th quotes from last year's London Yearly Meeting epistle as follows:

"We feel that we are on the eve of fresh and quickening revelations of the Power of the Living God. Let us be still for a moment and listen."

"We are being led of the Spirit into a new Day of Faith. Let us go forth to welcome it with glad hearts and outstretched hands."

"To meet the new burst of national, social, and intellectual life, which we so gladly welcome, we need a fresh breaking out within ourselves of the irresistible life of God."

"The spirit of complete and continuous concentration on the work of the Kingdom must spread throughout the whole body."

These words are worthy to become historic in that they serve as the rallying call for the whole Church to advance to higher ground. We are glad to quote further from this same issue of The London Friend, in which the editor with true prophetic vision sets a high standard for our denominational mission in the world and indicates the purpose of the autumn conference:

The conditions of today constitute a challenge to the whole Church of Christ, and to the adequacy and supremacy of the faith we profess. Is our Lord able to be Lord of the whole human race, and unify the discords between nations and classes of men? Can He fully meet the deepest longings of every human soul, and lead every human personality to its perfect fulfilment? Is His Gospel a satisfactory message of life and hope to India and China, as well as to England and America, to the toiler and the outcast as well as to the comfortable middle classes, to "seekers" of all kinds, practical, intellectual or mystical? These are some of the great questions which clamour for a clear answer from our generation.

As a Society, we do not believe that an answer is to be found only by reference to historical facts, or to an external authority. We stand, however, for the tremendous conviction that Christ is sufficient as He reveals Himself within the soul, and that His answer is ultimately satisfying for every human problem. If this answer be a true one, it ought to sound forth from our Society with no wavering note. Amidst these great movements of thought and stirrings of life, how may we do what God calls for from us? May not our Society be, as it were, reborn, as it faces with great seriousness the call of today, and hears afresh the call of God summoning it to fulfil its prophetic task?

How, then, are we best to give the message? To this question it is our purpose to seek an answer in the spirit of prayer and humility, and in the strength of a uniting fellowship. Coming together thus, we believe we shall feel within us also a deeper conviction and a fresh compulsion, and be led to bind ourselves together in the service of men and in the love of Christ.

Referring to this same conference in another editorial, the editor says:

We trust it may not be misunderstood if we say that the Society does not want, at this Conference, mere lectures or mere discussion, nor even at this state, "fellowship" only or "a happy time." Something vastly bigger and more vital is needed, namely, a new birth of Quakerism. We want a new dedication to its mighty evangel, to its universal spirit, to its far-reaching and absorbing claims and applications. We want the baptism, regeneration and redemption of the spirit of Christ to be the actual experience, real, vital, inward, of everybody who comes to the Conference. We want: Home Mission and Foreign Mission alike, old Friends and young Friends alike; a fresh sense of commission from God, a renewed consecration of gifts to His service, a fuller understanding of His will in the world today.

These are words which ought to strike deep into the heart and thought of American Quakerism. In them are revealed the ideals for which we must strive on this side of the Atlantic. Herein are revealed problems which cannot be thrust aside without hurt to ourselves. Can Quakerism occupy a larger place in the Christianizing forces of this twentieth century? Can there come to us the same fresh revelation of a divine message for this generation as came to Fox and his followers for the people of the seventeenth century? These are questions which should become the burden of every Yearly Meeting held this year. The future is big with promise, if we will only get into the channel of blessing and devote our consecrated energies assiduously to the tasks to which God is calling this branch of His Church.

The Mexican Situation

Whatever may be the outcome of the present situation in Mexico, every lover of peace will commend the readiness with which the administration at Washington agreed to accept the offers of mediation. This action is not only a splendid testimonial of our national desire for peace, but it will serve as an object lesson to Central and South American countries, to demonstrate the fact that the United States has no purpose to enlarge its colonial possessions on the Western hemisphere.

Of course, the possibility of further trouble remains. Mexico unfortunately has no stable government and no responsible head, and if Huerta and Carranza should both agree to the terms of the mediators, there is little guarantee that the Mexican people as a whole will abide the results. Meanwhile the fact should be emphasized that under no circumstances do we want war with Mexico, and this of itself will strengthen the efforts at mediation. America certainly has nothing to ask for except that peace shall reign again in Mexico and a stable government be established with the warring factions satisfied.

It is easier to float down stream than it is to row across currents. It is more comfortable to drift with the tide than to struggle with the wave. It is easier to be a nominal Christian than a virile working disciple, but the results determine the value of the procedure. The crown is promised to him who overcomes.

The local meeting ought to be its own best publicity agent. If the service is characterized by true and living worship, the whole community will feel the force of it.

Some people are willing to be Christians if somebody else will render all the service. There are too many drones in the Christian hive.

The consciousness of fellowship with Christ is more convincing of the truth of the gospel than all the philosophies of earth.

Office and Work of the Ministry

BY DR. JOSEPH WILSON*

"Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us we pray in Christ's stead be reconciled to God." II. Cor. 5: 20.

The titles given to ministers of the gospel in the New Testament indicate their office and duty. They are called apostles, prophets, witnesses, evangelists, teachers, overseers, servants of Christ, stewards of the mystery of God, co-workers with Christ, your (the people's) servants for Jesus' sake, shepherds, ambassadors for Christ. Each term determines some function of the minister's office and duty.

It is noticeable that they are never called "priests." The New Testament writers were not acquainted with priests as religious officers. They knew of heathen priests and Jewish priests, but carefully avoided giving that title to the Christian minister. There is but one priest in the Christian Church, Jesus Christ, the one Mediator between God and man.

A priest is a propitiator, one who brings the sins of the people before God and offers sacrifice, thus propitiating Divine wrath. There is but one effectual sacrifice for guilt, the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world. It is a derogation of Christ's unique work for any man to assume that title. The whole Church may indeed be called a priest because it is Christ's mystical body. It intercedes; it offers the sacrifice of its toils, suffering and prayers for a lost world outside of itself, but no one of its members can stand between Christ and His own body. The highest honor possible is membership in that body.

The priest and the ambassador exercise contrasting functions. The priest brings man's sins invoking pardon. The ambassador is the returning messenger declaring that pardon has been granted. The human priest pleads for a blessing and is uncertain whether it be granted. The ambassador announces that redemption has been wrought. If Christ had not died or if His death had been an incomplete atonement, the priest's work would have been in place. But the atonement is complete. There remaineth no more sacrifice for sin. To tell this fact in the ears of sinful men, an embassy from God has been constituted.

An earthly ambassador is the representative of one nation to another to declare the will of the nation which sends him to uphold the honor and protect the interests and further the welfare of his own country in his work.

1. First of all, he is appointed. He does not appoint himself. No doubt there are hundreds of Americans who deem themselves competent to be our ministers at the court of St. James, or the Tuilleries or Berlin, but their opinion does not make them ambassadors. They must be appointed and accredited.

2. The ambassador is given instructions and is to carry them out. He does not make his own instructions, nor select from those given him such as are agreeable. He is to execute the will of his own government, but not, however, as an automaton. He is not a mere letter carrier. His judgment, skill, courtesy, personal magnetism, powers of persuasion, are called into play.

3. His position is an honorable one. In his person his nation is involved. He is treated as if he were his whole country. No civilized or well-ordered government will permit an affront to an ambassador. His residence is inviolate. When he speaks it is the voice of his nation.

4. Inasmuch as in the varying aspects of diplomacy, perplexities may arise, he keeps in constant communication with his own government.

5. He is jealous for the rights of his own countrymen, protecting them from abuse and slander.

These functions of the earthly ambassador indicate, in part at least, the duty and office of the ambassador of Christ. He represents the Kingdom of heaven. The honor and interests of that Kingdom are in his hands.

1. He does not appoint himself. No one can appoint an ambassador for Christ except Christ Himself. The qualification first of all is the Divine call. However varied the mode of ordination in different denominations, the primary inquiry is this:

"Do you think, in your heart, that you are truly called according to the will of our Lord Jesus Christ?"

The divine call is absolutely necessary. Other considerations such as culture, fluency of speech, good manners, and so forth, are no consideration at all until the divine call has been made. The young man must ask himself, "Does God wish me to be a minister?" Any man will hesitate lest unauthorized from heaven he should press into this office. And yet the call is imperative: "Woe is me if I preach not the gospel." Still man's free will is not crushed. He may obey or disobey. Some have heard; have felt God's touch, and—have shaken off God's hand, and—then too late have mourned.

But how can a man know that God calls him? That is indeed a pivotal question. Few have such a signal summons as St. Paul. The call arises in the heart with the inquiry, "Does God want me for this work?" How does it happen to arise? There are various ways, but they are providential. God is behind them—a sermon such as this, a solemn service, a word from a pastor or Christian friend, an opening for an education, the suggestion of one's former schoolmates—whatever be the occasion of the thought, do not disregard it. It may be the Savior speaking to you.

Dr. Wilson is Dean of the Reformed Episcopal Seminary of Philadelphia, and delivered this sermon a few weeks ago. It was copied by one of our Philadelphia Friends, and sent to us with a request for publication in The American Friend.

And yet one may be mistaken; may fancy he is called when he is not. What then? Let him take counsel. His kindred, his pastor, the officials of the Church he would serve—these will help to a right decision.

2. Next, the Christian ambassador is to carry out his instructions. He is to deliver his Lord's message, to consecrate his learning, eloquence, his powers of mind and body with all the skill he possesses, and all this judiciously, aptly, opportunely. For he is an opportunist in the highest sense.

An ambassador in earthly courts is ever on the watch to serve his country. There are state papers and formal interviews of course, but besides these there is the happy work at the dining table or remark on the street to a fellow ambassador or to some subordinate. So the Christian ambassador; he is always on duty. He is not terrified by antagonism, but he does not arouse antagonism. He is courteous, kindly, persistent and firm. Ever in his mind is his Master's word, "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?"

There may arise a question of personal honor. He may acquire views which do not coincide with the message he is sent to deliver. What then? Let us recur to the analogy of the ambassador of a nation. He may disagree with his instructions and that so seriously that he does not wish those instructions carried out. Then he ought not to hold his place. He must resign. If ever a minister of Christ is so unhappy as to lose his faith in the gospel, the ministry is no place for him.

3. The Christian ambassador is to keep in communication with his own government, and for this he is not dependent upon the postoffice or the telegraph. His method of communication is prayer. He never prepares or delivers a sermon without prayer. As he visits the sick or calls upon parishioners, his heart reaches upward to the throne for the right word and the right act. He never forgets that he is God's messenger. Personal pique and personal irritation are restrained. What are his personal interests in comparison with the interests of the kingdom of God?

4. The Christian ambassador is in charge of the good name of his fellow countrymen, that is, his fellow Christians.

One of the devices of Satan is to excite suspicion and to circulate slander against Christians. It is not the minister's duty to give credence to such suspicions, still less to give wider circulation to slander. Such assaults upon God's people by the children of this world are to be expected. They called the Master of the house Beelzebub; how much more the members of his household? The brother against whom suspicions are aroused is to be consulted. If he has done wrong, he is to be vindicated; and that too, whether that person be friendly to the pastor or not. The Church is in an alien land. The minister is its advocate and defender.

The duty and the dignity of Christian ambassadorship go hand in hand. "God hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation." II. Cor. 5: 18. He might have given that ministry to other agents, but He chose not angels; He chose human beings. Cornelius, the Roman soldier, was praying that God would reward him by teaching him the gospel and send an angel to him, but the angel did not preach the gospel, but bade the soldier send him Simon Peter who would show the way. And so it has come to pass that we have this treasure in poor earthen vessels, but the treasurer is heaven.

Let us turn for a moment from the thought of the Christian minister as an ambassador, which office carries with it much of honor and something of authority, to the minister as the pastor, that is, the shepherd. It is the tender title and the dearest. It was morning on the shore of the lake of Galilee. The risen Savior and the penitent Peter stepped aside from the rest. He saith unto Peter, "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me?"

"Yea, Lord."

"Feed my lambs."

He saith unto him the second time, "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me?"

"Yea, Lord, I love thee."

"Tend my sheep."

He saith unto him again, "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me?"

"Yea, Lord, thou knowest that I love thee."

"Feed my sheep."

The evidence of love is the care for Christ's flock. They are Christ's sheep, not ours.

They are sheep, not dogs to be beaten and mastered. Sheep will not follow the shepherd who beats them. The sheep are better who are loved and the shepherd is happier whose sheep love him and they will love him who cares for them.

One morning in early spring I came upon a shepherd with his flock in a mountain valley in Idaho. The sun had not yet risen over the eastern hills, so there was a chill in the air. The cold did not trouble the sheep in their thick coats, but the lambs were shivering, and the shepherd too was cold. His hands were numb and he was stamping his feet to restore the circulation. It was an occasion on which he might have bewailed his lot and made himself more wretched by self pity. Or he might have made a fire to warm himself withal. But first he must care for the tender lambs. He found sheltered places for them. He held those which seemed more feeble against his own breast to give them warmth, and in handling them his numbed fingers grew supple again, and then the sun looked down upon the valley.

Francis E. Clark, President of the World Christian Endeavor Union, will soon attend a number of important Christian Endeavor conventions in France, Spain and England. He will visit a number of cities in each of these countries, speaking in behalf of the Christian Endeavor work, and also the cause of international peace and arbitration.

Philadelphia Yearly Meeting

Philadelphia Yearly Meeting was held from Fourth month 20th to 24th. It was truly the most encouraging Yearly Meeting I have ever attended—no radical progressiveness, no senseless conservatism—wide awake, but deliberate and steady, much concerned for the spirit but never quibbling over mere phraseology. The number in attendance was from 500 to 800 on each side of the house.

The "Select Meeting" so called (the meeting of Ministers and Elders) convened on Seventh-day, the 18th, and was regarded as more than usually impressive because of the exercise involved in considering the request of William C. Allen of San Jose, California, for a minute to travel in religious service in China, Japan and Australia, to be accompanied by his wife, and by his friend William B. Harvey, the present Superintendent of Westtown Boarding School. The extensive "concern" of Joseph Elkinton to travel, with his wife and two daughters, amongst Friends in Europe and Asia, visiting their meetings and missions and everything tending to the uplift of humanity amongst them, was also before the meeting. There were many expressions of tender feeling regarding these proposed labors of love for the Master. The meeting was drawn into a feeling of brotherly kindness toward all among whom our travelers may come. An adjourned session of the Select Meeting was held on Third-day morning, the 21st, which was characterized by more than one of the younger members of that meeting as an exceptionally favored occasion, when unity of feeling was united with dignity and depth of exercise.

The report of the representative meeting, read as usual at the opening session of the Yearly Meeting proper, on Second-day morning, the 20th, was intensely interesting, and justified fully the comment of an aged Friend of the type no longer very common as to appearance, that here is evidence that the Society is efficient and not asleep. But space does not permit a review of the report here. The proposal therein, to admit women Friends on an equal standing with men in that meeting, not, however, to increase the total number, was approved, and later in the week the two vacancies therein, caused by death during the past year, were filled by the appointment of Ann Sharpless and Jane W. Bartlett.

Another proposal contained in the same report, involved the appointment of a joint committee of men and women to prepare a message to Congress asking the passage of the proposed prohibition amendment. At a later session this committee presented a brief resolution addressed to the Judiciary Committees of the Senate and of the House requesting favorable action on the said bill, and stating that the Yearly Meeting had advised its members to use their personal influence with individual Congressmen in support of the proposed constitutional amendment. The resolution was endorsed heartily by the meeting.

The situation of our country in respect to Mexico and the burdens resting upon the President of the United States and his peace loving counsellors at this critical time, engaged the attention of the Yearly Meeting again and again during its various sessions, both in testimony and in vocal prayers, as well as by a special season of silent prayer on the last day of the meeting, and by a special telegram to the President. The meeting heard with profound attention the message of the federated churches on this subject, and endorsed the same, but preferred to appoint its own committee to consider our particular place and service. Another committee was instructed to address editors, publishers and managers of papers and magazines, both by personal interview and by letter, asking them not to stimulate the excitement incident to war or conditions that may lead to war.

A committee was appointed one year ago to consider the duty we owe to many not in membership with us, and the possibility of increasing our membership by accessions from those affiliated in various ways with Friends, as where one parent is a member or the individual has lost membership by disownment for reasons that do not now obtain, or where the individual is a frequent attender of meetings but has never officially joined the Society, or in cases where the person is the husband or the wife of a member. This committee made a very interesting report and was continued for further service in the same line. Subordinate meetings were requested to aid the committee by supplying names and data in order that a more complete and exact report may be made next year.

The answers to the Queries, the reports on Education and Primary Schools, the Westtown report, the report on the Indian School at Tunesassa, the report on the Dukabors in Canada, the letters from Friends in Australia, in China, and our replies to them, a brief letter from our beloved Jonathan E. Roads, a valued counsellor and minister, unable by reason of the infirmities of age to be present with us, all these as well as the proposed labors in foreign lands of the Friends having minutes for such service, as has been herein stated, were matters full of interest and lively concern, but space forbids more than passing notice here.

The Yearly Meeting of women Friends held their sessions in the western end of the same large house during the same time that the men were in session, and considered very nearly the same subjects, but in manner and degree corresponding more with their particular sympathies and interests. The subject of card playing claimed particular attention and a letter on gambling as the frequent outcome of the spirit that makes card playing so fascinating, was prepared and directed to be circulated. Another letter, addressed particularly to a group of girls at Wellesley College, who meet regularly for worship after the manner of Friends, was prepared and directed to be sent to such groups of our members wherever they may be.

In both men's and women's meetings this year there was great unity of feeling and expression, and the vocal exercise was well distributed. The writer remarked to a young man, "How beautiful is the unity!" The quick reply came, "I care far less for the unity than the power, and it is the power that has impressed me." Perhaps we both were right, for if there be unity in the right spirit will not the power be manifest? Both are beautiful.

Any report of the Yearly Meeting would be incomplete that omitted mention of the philanthropic organizations conducted by Friends which are auxiliary to the meeting, though not officially recognized thereby, and which hold their annual meetings in the afternoons or evenings when the meeting proper is not in session. These are all held at the Twelfth Street house, which is more suitable for evening sessions. Mention should also be made of the three public meetings for divine worship held on Fifth-day morning, which were well attended and regarded as seasons of divine favor. The one held in the house at Sixth and Noble, the center of the North House Settlement work, was unusually large this year. The regular week day meeting at this place will soon be discontinued, as it has seemed best to consolidate this meeting with the other two meetings located near it.

The missionary meeting held this year on First-day afternoon was addressed by George C. Doolittle from Syria, and by A. Edward Kelsey from the Friends Mission at Ramallah near Jerusalem. Our young people in particular are much interested in the foreign mission work. The Peace Association, holding its annual meeting on Second-day afternoon, seldom fails to draw a large company. The speaker this year was Rabbi Ben Levi of Pittsburg, to whom Philadelphia Friends always listen with profound interest and respect on the subject of peace. Never was this more true than this year.

The Freedmen's Association which conducts the industrial school at Christiansburg, Virginia, was ably addressed by Edgar A. Long (colored), principal of the school, and by Leslie Pinckney Hill, also colored, principal of our Cheney Training School of Managers. J. Henry Scattergood spoke interestingly of a "Recent Trip Among Southern Negro Schools." The Temperance Association met on Third-day evening and listened to Henry N. Pringle, from the International Reform Bureau at Washington, on "The Fight Against Liquor, National and Local." The subject is a live one with Friends everywhere.

On Fourth-day afternoon two young Friends, Edith Stratton and Esther A. Balderston (the latter is to leave us soon for work in Japan), spoke on "Our Attitude Toward the Student Volunteer Movement." Each had attended as a delegate the recent Kansas City convention. The North House Association made report on the year's work later in the afternoon of the same day, and the audience was treated to an exceptionally interesting address by Prof. J. P. Lichtenberger of the University of Pennsylvania, on "Problems in Social Progress."

Friends First Day School Association reported in the evening after tea, and the good sized audience listened to an earnest address by Elihu Grant of Smith College, a convinced Friend, on "What Constitutes Fruitful Bible Study." On Fifth-day evening, closing the evening meetings for the week, the Indian Aid

Association of Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting made its annual report. Rayner W. Kelsey of Haverford College, who visited most of the missions in Oklahoma during the summer of 1913, spoke on "The Work of Friends for Western Indians."

The time of holding the Yearly Meeting has been changed in order to better suit our schools and colleges, the farming community and Friends generally. The meeting is to convene next year on the last Second-day in Third Month. The Clerks of Men's Meeting this year were the same as last year, David H. Forsythe and Walter L. Moore. The Women's Meeting received resignations from their former most satisfactory Clerks, Rebecca Conrad and Susanna Kite, who have served the meeting capably for seven years, and appointed as Clerk Jane W. Bartlett, and as assistants, Mary W. Copperthwaite and Mary R. Williams.

Very few Friends from a distance were in attendance this year. Rufus King and Edward Edgerton were heard acceptably. A sense of gratitude to Him who "fills the hungry soul with goodness" is the covering of many spirits as we reflect upon the favors of this 233d session of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

Rejoicing

BY HARRIET F. BROOKS

Who now rejoice in my sufferings for you,—Col. 1: 24.

To rejoice is to feel or express joy or gladness over some event in our own or another's life.

St. Paul's rejoicing was of a more significant meaning. He wished to convey to the Church at Colosse, the deeper interpretation of this text. What had Paul to rejoice in just at this time? Nothing but his sufferings for the sake of his co-workers, to whom he was writing, such as imprisonment, shipwrecks and persecutions. Why should any sane man or woman delight in these hardships, particularly when received at the hand of others? St. Paul was not deserving of such harsh treatment.

Let us review the "Rise of the Quakers." George Fox, our founder and earliest messenger of Quakerism, suffered torture unknown to most of us. He is but one of many who submitted to cruelties for the sake of the new-born Society of Friends, in order that we of today might enjoy our meetings for worship without fear of an interruption by an officer of the law. Yet, these early Friends rejoiced at being persecuted for "conscience sake" and were ready to die if need be, for their Lord and Master, Jesus Christ.

If we truly appreciated the privilege of being Christians, whose heritage was so dearly bought by individuals like George Fox, we should be glad for trials, temptations or other calamities which befall us, but, we forget for the moment what Browning says, "God's in His heaven, all's right with the world."

When adverse winds blow across the desert places in our life, and sandstorms of grief, disappointment or lost opportunities nearly blind our spiritual vision, so that the Son of Righteousness is hid from our senses, do we not often echo the ancient prophet, who cried, "Lord, let me die."

We forget for the time the green oases along the way, sweet places where our feet have trod in harmony and fellowship with each other and with our greatest Friend. It is but the human element, so strong within that thought is seldom given to life's oases amid its storms.

Paul and others who blazed the trail for the Christian Church first, learned "to endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ;" second, they counted such afflictions which were grievous for but a moment; and third, they rejoiced in their sufferings for us.

It is well to rejoice in sufferings in order that others may believe in our Christ, not only in seasons of outward calm and happiness, but that we by showing the silver lining of our darkest cloud in periods of unrest and discontent, may reveal to those who know Him not the only true source of joy and happiness that they may believe in Him also.

Parable of the Unjust Steward

BY EDWARD WING

Are we misunderstanding the Parable of the Unjust Steward? The Sunday School teachers of a large part of the Christian world are soon to stand before their classes with this lesson before them, and the thought that they are to teach the young people of our country that, as one of our prominent quarterlies expresses it, "Jesus saw something in this man's forethought and action to admire," is a sad thought in the extreme.

Why should we be so slow to understand these words as spoken in irony to those who were deriding His plain earnest words? He would use every possible means of expression that He might fasten upon unwilling hearts the thought of their dishonesty with God. There are two things that we might reasonably expect that Jesus would do if He used this form of speech: first, that He would frame the picture in such a way and draw from it such conclusions as to make it practically impossible or at least difficult to interpret it in any other way; and second, that before leaving the thought He would change His style to direct teaching, so as to make doubly clear the lesson that He wishes to impress.

Let us see if Jesus did this. 1. Is it possible to find a reasonable interpretation of this parable and the conclusions which He draws from it in any other way than that He spoke in irony? This steward violates every principle of manhood and does it so openly that his lord knows it all. He knows that his conduct has been simply robbery. Can it be possible that Jesus is here drawing a picture true to life or simply illustrative of the dishonesty of the Jewish people as God's stewards? But let us go further and hear the conclusion He draws; "Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness that when ye fail they may receive you into everlasting habitations." If we do not find it impossible to believe that Jesus found something to admire in this flagrant thief, we certainly must in the conclusion that men could furnish everlasting habitations to their friends. 2. Does Jesus by changing to a direct method of teaching interpret the lesson which he has been seeking to enforce? Study His words for an answer. Hear Him say, "If ye have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who shall commit to you the true riches, etc.?" In this day when graft and unfaithfulness to trust is rife in our midst, and temptations to the young are strong, we need to give all possible emphasis to Jesus' words and in no case make Him condone dishonesty.

Names of Days and Months

BY SARAH B. WOODARD

I am both surprised and grieved when I hear so many of our church members, as well as those of other professions of Christ's gospel, using the names of the days of the week and of the months of the year, names that were given in honor of heathen gods. The early Christians did not use them, neither did our early Friends. They had a reason for refusing to do so, because to do so was disobeying God's commands. We will first consider the first day of the week. It was the day on which Christ rose from the dead. And in honor of that day the early Christians called it Sabbath. I do not know just what date it was given that name, but it was given in honor of Christ's resurrection and now when we call it Sunday, instead of Sabbath, we dishonor Christ and at the same time break a command of God.

Perhaps some will ask where I find that command. Exodus 23: 13, "In all things that I have said unto you be circumspect and make no mention of the name of other gods, neither let it be heard out of thy mouth." In Joshua 23: 7 it is commanded, "Neither make mention of the name of their gods." Then in Hosea 2: 17 and Psalms there are similar expressions. It is very evident that God is displeased with the familiar use of those names. There were people who worshiped the sun and it was in his honor as a god that the name was given to that day. There are four months that have numerical names, but those are not given to the months they properly represent. September, October, November, December, 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, instead of 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th, but the same objection does not apply to those names as to the other months of the year. Time has not worn off and never will or can obliterate the fact that those names are names of heathen gods. The numerical names are just as easy to use when we form the habit.

Do not say that this is a little thing, not worth paying attention to. It is the little foxes that spoil the vines, and anyone that lightly passes over the breaking of one of God's commands, will not find it a little thing when the time of reckoning shall come.

Financing the Work of the Church

V. AN ENGLISH MONTHLY MEETING BUDGET

Since the last article under the above general heading was mailed to the editor of THE AMERICAN FRIEND, a "Schedule of Collections," which a Monthly Meeting in England prints and sends annually to each of its three hundred and twenty-seven members, has been received through the kindness of that meeting's Treasurer. Although not adapted to use under the different conditions prevailing in this country, it offers some profitable suggestions to Friends who are interested in the movement for a better financial system in our American Yearly Meetings. It is reproduced here in slightly abridged form.

ALTON, SOUTHAMPTON & POOLE MONTHLY MEETING.

Subscriptions, 191....

Dear Friend—Below is a Schedule of the Collections required for the support of our particular meeting; Sussex, Surrey and Hants Quarterly Meeting; the Yearly Meeting, including its various Committees and Schools; the Friends' Foreign Mission Association, etc., for the meeting year from 1st October, 191.... to 30th September, 191....

1. Preparative Meeting Fund. This fund pays all regular expenses in connection with our local meeting.

2. No. 2 is left blank for insertion of any special local purposes.

3. Monthly Meeting Representatives' Travelling Fund. Pays the travelling expenses of an agreed number of Representatives to each Monthly Meeting.

4. Quarterly Meeting Fund. Provides for everything outside the purely local expenses of each meeting, e. g., assistance to poor Friends, repairs to meeting-houses and other property, also travelling expenses of Friends travelling with minutes.

5. Quarterly Meeting Dinner Fund. Pays £10 to the particular meeting in which each Quarterly Meeting is held.

6. Yearly Meeting Fund. Is applied for the General Expenses of the Society of Friends, including the maintenance of its Central Offices at Devonshire House, the salaries of its officers, the printing of the Yearly Meeting Epistle and other literature, the travelling expenses of Ministers on Foreign Service, etc., etc.

7. Home Mission and Extension Committee. Its object is to help Monthly Meetings in the building up of meetings and the extension of their work.

8. Central Education Committee. It surveys the whole field of education in the Society, and is working out a coherent scheme in which each of the Boarding Schools shall take a definite sphere.

9. Anti-Slavery Committee, Pemba Mission. The value of this work is well known to Friends.

10. Ackworth School.

11. Saffron Walden School.

Assistance to the valuable work done by these schools is much needed.

12. Friends' Foreign Mission Association is commended to the liberality of all.

It is believed that if members cannot contribute to all the Funds, they will consider it a privilege as well as duty to contribute to as many of the objects as possible. The work of the Society is always growing and thus calls for increasing expenditure, which can only be met by the liberal support of its members generally. Those who cannot give largely are invited to give even small sums to any objects they may feel specially interested in.

Directions will be found below as to the mode by which payments may be made.

Yours truly,

Collector.

Among the noticeable features of the above Schedule are: (1) The fulness of information which it gives to every member of the meeting in regard to the objects for which funds are needed. (2) The large range of objects for which it provides funds. (3) The option which it offers members of limited means in making their subscriptions. (4) The comparison which it institutes between an individual's subscriptions in two successive years. (5) The definite pledge to which the contributor subscribes.

Large gifts for educational purposes continue to be reported. Edgar Palmer, of Rye, New York, has offered to build a stadium for Princeton University to cost $300,000. The Carnegie fund has offered Wellesley College $750,000 on condition that $1,250,000 be raised within a specified time. Mrs. George W. Hoopes has tendered $100,000 to the University of California to be applied in support of a school of medical research. The President of the Singer Sewing Machine Company has announced that $500,000 is at the disposal of the Cathedral of St. John, the Divine, New York City, to be applied in founding and maintaining a school of music for the training of cathedral and church choirs.

THE WHITTIER FELLOWSHIP GUEST HOUSE

Once more the Whittier Fellowship Guest House will open its doors as a place for the study and experience of the fundamentals of Quakerism in a pleasant New England village near the sea, where Friends of every shade of thought have become acquainted in the mellow atmosphere of Whittier's often described and best loved country. From Seventh month 1st to Ninth month 15th, 1914, it will be ready to receive guests who come seeking to enter into fellowship and to see the meaning of worship in life.

During the summer various subjects will be considered as present day means of expressing our ideal, but at all times it is hoped that the ideal of the Divine Presence and Guidance as the great fundamental fact of life and labor will be the central concern. Beside the precious seasons for fellowship in worship, there will be through all the weeks lectures and discussions of the primary facts of our message. This is the chief concern of the Whittier Guest House and its fellowship. The various subjects, social and otherwise, are only evidence of the determination to see how the Inner Light is to affect our lives at this moment.

These are some of the subjects to be considered:

How can the Quaker Conception of Religion be Expressed to the World?

Whittier's Contribution to Religious Life and Worship.

How can Friends Contribute to the Federation of Churches?

Modern Methods of Religious Teaching for Children.

Quakerism and the Fine Arts.

Modern Politics and Quaker Democracy.

Spiritual Aspects of the Woman's Movement.

Friends' Testimony Against Oaths and War.

The Tension Between the Races.

The exact dates and hosts for the above conferences will be published shortly. A group of English Friends, including possibly Elizabeth Fox Howard and Harriet Newman, will be at the Guest House part of the time. Those who feel interested in these concerns and desire to take part in them, may write to The Whittier Fellowship Guest House, Hampton Falls, New Hampshire. The expense of living at the Guest House is $10.00 per week, and the sea and beautiful New England coast bring us seasons of play and refreshment.

GOLDEN WEDDING

Fifty years ago on April 21st, in Carthage, Indiana, Josiah Binford and Margaret F. Hill, two young Quakers, were married. Fifty years later in Russell Hall, at Friends' University, Wichita, Kansas, they celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of the event. Mr. and Mrs. Binford were married according to the custom of the Friends of fifty years ago, without the aid of preacher, judge or justice. On their fiftieth anniversary in the presence of four or five hundred members of the Friends' Church and numerous invited friends, they again enacted the marriage ceremony just as they did fifty years ago.

Arrangements had been made by the Church to provide a wedding dinner for all present. Professor B. W. Truesdell prepared from pictures in the possession of Mr. and Mrs. Binford a series of plates that were used with his stereopticon to convey to the visitors something of the life and activities of this couple who are so much beloved by the people of Wichita. Among these pictures is one taken at the time of their wedding, in which both wore the conventional clothes of the Quakers of that day.

Mr. Binford was born in Indiana seventy-three years ago, and Mrs. Binford in North Carolina, two years later. After their marriage they lived in Indiana till 1885, when they came to Kansas and settled on a homestead near the present site of the town of Haviland. Mr. Binford was president of the town-site company when Haviland was platted and placed on the map.

Together this couple have always worked for the moral and educational welfare of the public. They assisted in making possible the first sod church at Haviland and later did much toward the erection of a more sightly and commodious place of worship. When the need for higher education became imperative, they helped to establish the Friends' Academy at Haviland, which is still doing good work.

Mr. Binford was for fifteen years a member of the board of trustees of Friends' University. In March, 1900, they moved from Haviland to Wichita and took charge of South Hall, the girls' dormitory of the university. Since that time they have had full charge of South Hall, nearly eight years.

Dan Binford, their youngest son, is now in charge of a fine Y. M. C. A. building dedicated last week at Auburn, Indiana; Gurney Binford, their oldest son and his wife are missionaries in Japan; Dr. Raymond Binford, another son, is a member of the faculty at Guilford College, North Carolina; Miss Myra Binford, the only daughter, is teacher of domestic science in Wilmington College, Ohio; another son, Bevan Binford, now dead, was a member of the faculty at Friends' University at the time the school was opened. The only one of the children who was able to attend this golden wedding anniversary was M. H. Binford, who lives on a farm seven miles southwest of Wichita. —"Wichita Beacon."

FOREIGN MISSION WORKERS

Further unification of effort in missions is the object of the Federation of Woman's Boards for Foreign Missions, whose national advisory commission convened in Chicago April 24. Practically all of the woman's foreign mission boards are organized in territorial commissions, representatives from which constitute the central body. Through the committee of twenty-eight, which has charge of plans for the annual missionary campaigns, the federation participates in a unification of home and foreign interests, giving larger efficiency to educational and other work for world evangelization.

The Chicago meeting was preceded by a session of the Chicago territorial commission, at which fourteen boards, operating in nineteen states, were present. Plans for the summer schools were specially considered. April 23, the visitors were entertained at a luncheon at the home of Mrs. C. E. Vickers, of Oak Park, the guests of honor being Mrs. George W. Coleman, Boston; Mrs. De Witt C. Knox, New York; Mrs. Mary C. Porter, Pittsburg; Miss Effie Cunningham, Indianapolis; Mrs. H. B. Pinney, San Francisco; Miss Margaret Burton, New York; Mrs. B. Krammes, Tiffin, Ohio, and Mrs. D. B. Wells.

In the regular session a model constitution for territorial commissions was approved; encouraging reports of the quarterly Bulletin were received, and the plans for regional conferences for mission study class leaders were approved. The commission will meet in 1915 at San Francisco, where it will probably co-operate in the congress of missions.

Officers were elected as follows: Chairman, Mrs. De Witt C. Knox, New York; vice chairman, Mrs. Oliver R. Williamson, Chicago; secretary, Miss Mabel Cratty, New York; treasurer, Mrs. W. I. Haven, New York.—The Continent.

AT NEW CASTLE, INDIANA

The young men's Bible School Class with Jessie Slifer as teacher, has rented and furnished reading and club rooms down town, to which they are inviting all young men that may be interested in Sabbath School. After presentation of the matter by the pastor on Sunday morning, the 26th, sufficient money was raised to furnish the rooms. The arrangement is proving to be a great blessing and benefit. Several conversions have resulted from the personal work of the members of this class.

SCIPIO QUARTERLY MEETING

Scipio Quarterly Meeting was held April 24-26 in the assembly room of Oakwood Seminary at Union Spring, New York. There was an unusually large attendance and the presence of our non-resident members was especially cheering. We were favored in having with us Dr. George F. DeVol, Friends' medical missionary at Luh Ho, China. On Friday evening he gave a most interesting account of his work. At the other sessions of the Quarterly Meeting his gospel messages were characterized by simplicity and directness and were given in the love of Christ and the power of the Holy Spirit.

In the Young People's Meeting on Sabbath evening, to which all the Young People's Societies of the village had been invited, the presence of the Master was very manifest. An after meeting for individual consecration and prayer was held and a number attended, mostly seminary students.

A deep sense of God's presence has characterized all the sessions of the Quarterly Meeting for which we are most grateful. Some definite and aggressive measures are being taken by this Quarterly Meeting for the establishing of Friends' work in this section. The seminary students, teachers and Friends located at this place, by their faithfulness to the Master are important factors in making our meeting a success. Their voices are frequently heard in our regular meetings for worship.

WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY UNION OF FRIENDS

Muncie, Indiana, May 7 to 12, 1914.

"The women that publish the tidings are a great host."—Ps. 68: 11.

The Purpose of the Conference

To stimulate united prayer and study and a spirit of fellowship in service; to secure a deeper realization of the whole task of foreign missions; a clearer understanding of difficulties and problems; a fuller development of resources and a truer conception of the dignity, scope and purpose of women's work for missions.

PERSONAL MENTION

Delia Fistler arrived in San Francisco from India the last of March. Her health is poor and she will remain some time on the Pacific coast for rest and recuperation.

Milo S. Hinckle, pastor at Lynn, Indiana, has been in a hospital at Indianapolis, where he underwent a severe operation on April 9th. He has recovered, however, and has returned to his work.

Dr. George F. DeVoi of the Luh Ho mission in China, and who is in this country on a furlough, attended the March missionary meeting at Poughkeepsie, and told many interesting things about hospital life in China. Sixty dollars was given for his work.

Arthur Chilson attended the meeting at New Castle, Indiana, on Sabbath, April 26. His audience was deeply moved by his wonderful message and strong appeal for help in the African field. The sum of $363 was pledged for the support of the work in that field.

David E. and Sarah M. Sampson, of North Carolina, are busy in gospel work in England and Scotland. "The London Friend" of April 17th, reports them as visiting several places in the latter country during the first half of April. They also attended the recent Quarterly Meeting at Birmingham in England.

HOME COMING AT UPLAND

The Friends of Upland, Indiana, have arranged for a "home coming" of their Church on May 10th. Lindley A. Wells of Portland, Oregon, will bring the message for the occasion. Improvements have been made on the meeting-house recently to the extent of between three and four hundred dollars.

MINISTERIAL ASSOCIATION

The Ministerial Association of Indiana Yearly Meeting will be held at Ludlow Falls, Ohio, May 20 to 22, preceding the convention of the Yearly Meeting Christian Endeavor Union at West Milton, only two miles away. It is expected that there will be a large attendance.

Delegates should send their names for assignment of homes to William Elleman, Ludlow Falls, Ohio. Dinner and supper will be served free to all at the church. Edith Miles Pearson will have charge of the music.

Ludlow Falls can be reached by trolley every hour from Dayton, or from Piqua and Covington; or by the Big Four Railroad from New Castle and Lynn, or by the C. H. and D. Railroad.

The following is the tentative program:

HAVERFORD COLLEGE

THE addition of a Professor of Social Work to the Faculty of Haverford College in a sense rounds out a department which has most to do with the development of scholars who wish to appreciate or join in the movement towards effective Christian activities.

Such scholars will not all be ministers, though some of them may. They may not give their whole lives to efforts for humanity, though some of them may. But as business or professional men they may wish to understand the religious and social problems of the day and aid those who more fully occupy themselves with their solution.

The subject will be taught by Rufus M. Jones in Philosophy, Henry J. Cadbury in Biblical Literature, and Frank D. Watson in Social Work. Dr. Watson comes from the New York School of Philanthropy, where he has held the position of Professor of Social Economics. From both the practical and scientific side and from his qualities as a man and as a teacher he is amply qualified to create and satisfy a large interest in the various phases of social reorganization, and the duty of the educated man in this direction.

The other opportunities of Haverford College in English, Economics, History, the Languages and Sciences are open to students of this department.

BIBLE SCHOOL LESSON

May 17.

Subject.—The Rich Man and Lazarus.

Lesson.—Luke 16: 14, 15, 19-31.

Golden Text.—Whoso stoppeth his ears at the cry of the poor, he shall also cry, but shall not be heard. Prov. 21: 13.

Time.—January A.D. 30.

Place.—Perea.

Christ frequently startled his auditors by showing that the gospel standard of the measurement of a man was vastly different from the human standard. In today's lesson we have a perfectly drawn picture of social extremes in which the contrast of social standing here is only equalled by the contrast of the changed conditions hereafter.

The rich man was typical of his class, not wicked because of his riches, but supremely selfish in his possessions. He was of a type which has been well known in every age. We can see him surrounded by every luxury, the favored son of fortune, revelling in his wealth, honored as a man of affairs in the community, but in the midst of it all supremely selfish, giving never a thought to the needy or bestowing never a care upon the suffering.

Probably he owned the finest house in the community, was the host for every event in high society, and had he only taken time to think of his stewardship, he might not have been wholly bad. As it was, he had no interest in any one not of his set, and probably had little care for them except as they could minister to his own enjoyment.

Lazarus (Eleazar, Heb.) was the embodiment of poverty, an outcast who in his extremity was brought and laid at the gate of Dives, that he might catch some of the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table. He was reduced to abject want and had not the strength to drive away the dogs which came and licked his sores.

Here were two men at the opposite ends of the ladder. But the scene changes. Both pass through the same gate of death into the beyond, the despised outcast to be carried into the presence of the angels to repose upon the bosom of the Faithful; the wealthy weaver of purple to be buried and to pass into the realm of torment, there to suffer in anguish with not even the dogs to come and minister to him.

Then it is that Dives becomes the suppliant. The order is reversed. God's standards are not as man's standards. The measure of a man is according to what he is; and what he is here rather than what he seems to be determines his destiny hereafter.

We have enough in the Bible and in the personal revelations of God by means of the Holy Spirit, to lighten the pathway of all men, to bring them to a knowledge of the gospel plan of redemption. If the world will not believe the evidences at hand, they will not believe though one rose from the dead.

Here was a man who had great opportunities to use his wealth as a means of blessing to the world. But he failed miserably and accumulated wealth to consume it upon himself. It was his own property to be sure, to be used as he liked, but the manner of its using lost him his heritage for eternity.

The lesson is proof of the immortality of the soul and that the moral issues of life here determine the soul's status in the beyond.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR

May 17.

Topic.—What is a Christian Life? James 1: 19-27. (Union meeting with the Juniors.)

The question set forth in the topic is a vital one, to which every young person needs to have an answer in terms of his own understanding. The pledge includes a promise to try to live the Christian life.

The Christian life is one which Christ has begotten. No makeshift profession, no make-believe claim will suffice. Jesus said, "Ye must be born again."

The Christian life is a surrendered life, a devoted, consecrated life, whose highest and best purpose is to follow whithersoever the Master leads.

The Christian life is a joyous life, for there is no joy so great as the consciousness of being saved through Christ. "Now are we the sons of God," and if sons then heirs and joint heirs with Christ.

The Christian life is being obedient to the Master. Loyalty and faithfulness are essential qualities for which there are no substitutes.

Ask each member to give his own answer in his own way to the question, "What is a Christian?" It will incite prayerful thought and lead many to a critical analysis of the Christian life which they have never experienced before.

CONFERENCE OF MEN

The following interesting communications endorsing the proposed Conference of men have been received.

Pasadena, California,
April 21, 1914.

S. Edgar Nicholson:

Dear Friend—I want to commend you for the stand you have taken regarding the Conference of men suggested in the columns of THE AMERICAN FRIEND, and for your last article on that subject, in the number of April 16.

I have met and am meeting young men like myself, who have the cause of American Quakerism at heart, but who often wonder if the Church of their adoption is really worth a life investment. The Society of Friends in this country has got to wake up, and that right quickly to the fact that she must show that she is worth while, if she hopes to swing the young men and older men into line as a solid unit.

Give the men a task, help them towards a larger vision of the world's need. If the Church can begin to do this, she is rightfully filling her place, and the way to help towards this end is to arouse enthusiasm by calling a conference and giving a great impetus to the movement.

Yours for a larger vision,
JOHN W. DORLAND.

HAPPY NOW

Family of Twelve Drink Postum

"It certainly has been a blessing in our home," writes a young lady in regard to Postum.

"I am one of a family of twelve, who, before using Postum, would make a healthy person uncomfortable by their complaining of headache, dizziness, sour stomach, etc., from drinking coffee.

"For years mother suffered from palpitation of the heart, sick headache and bad stomach and at times would be taken violently ill. About a year ago she quit coffee and began Postum.

"My brother was troubled with headache and dizziness all the time he drank coffee. All those troubles of my mother and brother have disappeared since Postum has taken the place of coffee.

"A sister was ill nearly all her life with headache and heart trouble, and about all she cared for was coffee and tea. The doctors told her she must leave them alone, as medicine did her no permanent good.

"She thought nothing would take the place of coffee until we induced her to try Postum. Now her troubles are all gone and she is a happy little woman enjoying life as people should."

Name given by the Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum now comes in two forms:
Regular Postum—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

THE MOTHERS OF THE WORLD

BY CHARLES M. SHELDON

The things that linger longest in the heart,
The thoughts that never vanish when we roam,
The friendships that are never torn apart,
Are those that center longest 'round the Home.

The deepest joys, the happiest hours we know,
Are those which cost us only what we give
Of happiness to others here below,
This is the truest life that we can live.

We strive and struggle to succeed, and pass
Our fellows in the hurrying daily race;
And O, how often burn our hearts, alas!
With envy of our neighbor's wealth and place.

And Time goes on relentlessly to prove
How vain are all the clamor and the strife,
Compared with quiet and enduring love—
The greatest thing for every human life.

Forgotten are the deeds that men call great,
Forgotten are the kings in battle met,
Lost to the memory an empire's fate,
But there are things the heart cannot forget.

As long as earth shall last, it cannot lose
The vision of a Home of simple bliss;
As long as men shall have the power to choose,
They cannot choose a better thing than this.

And when the end shall come, as come it must
To every one of us both young and old,
The pomp and fashion shall be "dust to dust,"
And worthless lie the silver and the gold.

But we shall learn the lesson of the years,
And learn what makes a nation small or great,
And say, with gratitude, while fall our tears,
"The Mothers of the world control its fate."

—The Congregationalist.

Conference of Friends in Cuba

By C. G. McCLEAN

The Eleventh Annual Conference of the Society of Friends in Cuba, was celebrated in Puerto Padre, April 6-8, 1914. It was a very delightful and helpful occasion and everything seemed to work together to make it so. The only thing regrettable about it was that none of the Friends from Banes were present, the faithful pastor, Charles Haworth, having been suddenly called to the States a few weeks before by the illness of Mrs. Haworth. Joseph Purdie, principal of the Banes school, on whom the burden of the church work has fallen, did not feel that he could attend. No delegates were sent. Eight delegates boarded the train at Holguin and were joined at Iberia by an equal number from Gibara. Two more were picked up at Chaparra. So Henry Cox found quite a company on his hands when the train pulled into the Puerto Padre station.

The opening service was an inspiring meeting and sort of set the pace for the whole Conference. Henry Cox presided, and, after a few words of welcome and general opening exercises, introduced the President of the Conference, Pastor Jose Reyes of Gibara, who spoke briefly on the purpose of the Conference, how to make it a success and what it should mean to us. The principal speaker of the evening was S. A. Neblett of Mantanzas, who was present as representative of the American Bible Society. He gave a very instructive address on the diffusion of Bible knowledge in the world.

At the close of the meeting, all the delegates were invited to the broad veranda of the mission house where delicious sandwiches and ice cream were served and a general social time enjoyed. Tuesday morning we were all astir soon after five o'clock, for there was a sunrise prayer meeting at six. This was the rule each morning of the Conference, after which followed the breakfast of coffee and bread and a little time for committee meetings or sight-seeing before the regular Conference session at eight-thirty. There were four sessions which were given to reports, papers and discussion touching the four principal branches of our work: Evangelistic, Sunday School, Christian Endeavor and Day School.

The principal theme of the Evangelistic session was how to develop a larger degree of self-support in the native church. For the Sunday School period, it was a discussion of more efficient means and methods. A very good paper was read by May M. Jones touching the latter phase—better methods. The Day School was considered as a factor in evangelization and particularly, the opportunities of Christian teachers. The Christian Endeavor was also discussed in its relation to the church—what the young people may do for the church as well as what the church can do for them, and the ideal to which the Society should work.

The reports showed that Pueblo Padre and Holguin are leading in Day School work, with Gibara and Puerto Padre showing the greatest advance in Sunday School and Christian Endeavor lines. The reports of Evangelistic work in Gibara were especially encouraging, that place having enjoyed a very blessed revival within the last few weeks. Banes station, owing to the absence of the pastor the greater part of the year, and the consequent overworking of the rest of the force, shows retrenchment in most all lines. The principal feature from Banes is the establishment by Joseph M. Purdie of a monthly paper, El Faro Cristiano, which already has quite a subscription list among our members and is proving a great blessing to many.

Every evening was given to public religious services and all were quite well attended except the last night which was rainy. Sylvester Jones delivered the principal address Tuesday night and Zenas L. Martin Wednesday night, the latter being on the subject of Temperance. Both were very good. Several special choruses were sung at the evening services, by the young people of Puerto Padre, and, also, a few by the delegates from Gibara and Holguin.

The Conference was a success. Our Lord was with us and blessed us. Every delegation brought some inspiring message of success during the year, and every one went home with a purpose to accomplish in the coming year something that some one else has proved possible in the past year.

Jose Reyes made an agreeable and energetic President, and the faithfulness and accuracy of Caridad Luisa Fernandez as Secretary was notable. The officers for the coming year are:

President—Joseph M. Purdie, Banes.

Vice-President—C. G. McClean, Holguin.

Secretary—Caridad L. Fernandez, Holguin.

Treasurer—Isabel Barcelo, Puerto Padre.

Chairman Program Committee for next year, Sylvester Jones, Gibara.

The Doctrine of the Holy Spirit

The gift of the Holy Spirit has ever been held a cardinal doctrine by the Society of Friends. The Uniform Discipline declares that "conviction for sin is awakened by the operation of the Holy Spirit, causing the soul to feel its need of reconciliation with God." Again it says, "Christ Himself baptizes the surrendered soul with the Holy Spirit, enduing it with power, bestowing gifts for service."

Speaking of the Holy Spirit, the Richmond Declaration of Faith (1887) says: "Dwelling in the hearts of believers, He opens their understandings that they may understand the Scriptures, and becomes, to the humbled and surrendered heart, the Guide, Comforter, Support and Sanctifier. * * * This Holy Spirit is the seal of reconciliation to the believer in Jesus, the witness to his adoption into the family of the redeemed; the earnest and the foretaste of the full communion and perfect joy which are reserved for them that endure unto the end. * * * We believe in no principle of spiritual light, life or holiness, but the influence of the Holy Spirit of God, bestowed on mankind, in various measures and degrees, through Jesus Christ our Lord."

The report of the recent Deputation of English Friends to Madagascar, in which is set forth the ground work of the Quaker faith and practice contains the following: "We believe that the religion of Jesus Christ is primarily spiritual in its essence, and that every follower of His ought to have, and can have, direct personal intercourse with God, through the operation of His Holy Spirit in the human heart. * * * Our aim is so to present the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ that it may awaken a response from within the hearer and lead him to recognize the Voice of God in his own soul."

Jesus Himself gave the promise of another Comforter, or Advocate or Helper, even the Holy Spirit, who "shall teach you all things, and bring to your remembrance all that I said unto you." Later at Pentecost, when all were gathered together in one place we find that "they were all filled with the Holy Spirit," as the initial experience preparatory to the marvelous preaching of the apostles who became the pioneers of the Christian Church.

The doctrine of the existence and operations of the Holy Spirit has been much abused. It has frequently been ignored. A leading denominational paper admits that "there is a quite general failure to acknowledge fully the work of the Holy Spirit in the Church of the present day." Even among Friends, there has been such a medley of teaching and interpretation of the doctrine that many have dismissed it apparently from their minds. In all too many minds the Holy Spirit has little if any association except with the day of Pentecost, while others associate Him wholly with some extraordinary experience of doubtful reality for which the more zealous and emotional Christians strive with periodic devotion.

The promise that was realized at Pentecost has been continued until this hour. No less than on that memorable day is the Holy Spirit in the world now, ready as then to come into every life in the fullness of blessing and with an equipment of power that is adequate for every service. As He was present to reveal Christ to the early Church, so is He present today to reveal this same Jesus to every sin-burdened son and daughter of Adam. As He was the inspiration of holy men who penned the Scriptures, so He is here today to enlighten the mind, to interpret the truth, to reveal to human consciousness the very essence of the gospel as applied to human need. As His touch brought life and power to the Apostles, so does His presence and indwelling vitalize every soul today that is open to receive Him.

The power of the believer does not lie in his outward strivings, nor yet alone in his mental acceptance of divine truth. The power of the Church is not in its great conventions, not in its organism alone, nor yet in its acceptance of sound doctrinal creeds. It is "not by might, nor by power, but by my spirit, saith Jehovah of Hosts."

Every individual Christian must experience in his own life the redemptive work of Jesus Christ, and every Church must incorporate into its organism the realism of a spiritual union with God. In all such lives and organisms the Holy Spirit comes as an abiding Presence to comfort, to instruct, to guide, to strengthen, to keep, to reveal new fields of gladness and service and to equip with efficiency for every task to which Christian discipleship may be called.

What a man is rather than what he seems to be determines his status both now and hereafter.

The Bread of Life

BY FRANCIS C. ANSCOMBE

The discourse of Jesus on the Bread of Life (John VI) is worthy of the deepest consideration. In choosing similes with which to illustrate the nature of his relation to mankind, Jesus constantly compared himself to the great essentials of existence. Thus he said: "I am the Way, the Truth and the Life," "I am the Light of the World," "I am the True Vine," and in this instance "I am the Bread of Life."

Christ is Indispensable—It is evident then that Jesus regarded religion as essential to human welfare. Without life or light or bread existence would be impossible. Jesus thus emphasizes in the strongest possible manner the very necessity of religion. Further he makes the most stupendous personal claims. He is, himself, the Life and the Light and the Bread of Life. Jesus claims to bear exactly the same relation to man's spiritual needs as bread does to his physical needs. Christ, then, is indispensable—just as indispensable as bread.

Even the busiest man takes time to eat; the house-keeper does not regard the preparation of food as a burden. The partaking of food is vital. Jesus indicates that it is just as important to partake regularly of spiritual food. Christianity is essential; Christ is bread. It is popularly supposed that strength, food, shelter, education, capacity and success are fundamental to life. Christ emphatically says that he also is essential. Many persons have regarded religion as non-essential, as superstition, as sentiment, or as ethics perhaps. But surely nothing is of more vital necessity than bread.

Regular Meals—If then Christ be indispensable, how important it is that all who profess His name take some care to partake regularly of the Bread of Life. No one would be content with one good meal in seven days, yet probably the weakness of the Christian Church is due to the fact that so many of its members only partake of the Bread of Life at one or two regular Church services per week. There ought surely to be as much method and regularity in partaking of spiritual food as in the nourishment of our bodies.

Leanness of Soul—Malnutrition and starvation are very apparent in many a Christian's experience. Fellowship with Christ must be maintained. Saints as well as athletes are developed by careful dieting and practice. Christianity is neither an affair of memories or of emotions; it is a relationship with God through Jesus Christ. There would be no dearth of workers in the Church if all the members regarded the maintenance of their spiritual strength as a personal obligation. Many church members are parasites—they never prepare their own spiritual food. Practically every congregation includes some who never pray, seldom read the Scriptures and whose souls in consequence are atrophied.

Appetite—One not infrequently hears it said, "I used to pray, but it does not seem real to me now; I used to read the Bible, but it does not mean anything to me now; I used to enjoy the church services, but I seem to have lost interest." Such persons are suffering from loss of appetite and malnutrition. Loss of appetite is always a serious symptom and deserves immediate attention. For some viands appetites have to be acquired. A missionary often finds the foods in a foreign country unpalatable, but in time learns to relish them. An appetite has to be acquired, especially by those who have not been raised by Christian parents. Should this be read by any one who has lost his appetite for the Bread of Life we urge him to turn to the Great Physician and diligently to cultivate the appetite.

Simplicity—Jesus took pains to make his gospel simple. He asks nothing difficult. "Follow Me," "Open the Door and let Me in," "Knock and it shall be opened unto you," "Take eat." Is it difficult to open the door when one hears someone knocking? Is it difficult to take food when it is offered? It is not necessary that one understand where or how the wheat was grown, or where or how the grain was milled, or where or how the bread was baked; neither is it necessary to understand the processes of digestion in order that bread may nourish; all that is necessary is that one eat it. There are a thousand questions concerning God, Christ and Salvation that cannot fully be answered. It is not essential to answer them. All that is necessary is that the hungry soul find Christ, believe Him and receive Him. Religion is not metaphysics; it is an experience. Christianity is not speculative theology; it is receiving Christ.

Feasts, Not Lectures—Church services then should be occasions when the Bread of Life is distributed to the congregation. It is not much satisfaction to a hungry man to be brought into a well-equipped dining room and then to have to listen to an elaborate disquisition concerning the food upon the table. What he needs is the food. We wonder whether our preachers sometimes give the congregation an elaborate lecture concerning Christ instead of giving them Christ Himself. Worship is a feast, not a lecture. We also wonder whether some congregations prefer the lecture!

A Personal Matter—There are many things that one may have done for oneself by another; but partaking of food is purely a personal matter. So is religion. Association with saints does not produce holiness; else Judas would have been a saint. One's spiritual life must be maintained by one's own personal continued fellowship with Jesus.

Earlham, Indiana.

"Reflect upon your present blessings, of which every man has many; not on your past misfortunes, of which all men have some."—Dickens.

The Nearness of Salvation

BY ANDREW C. ELLIS, D.D.

"The word is nigh thee, in thy mouth, and in thy heart, the word of faith, which we preach."—Rom. 10: 8.

This sentence from Paul is in the midst of a profound discussion full of questions and mystery. But the argument rests upon certain simple and glorious facts. Righteousness is the result of right relations. The righteousness which Moses describes was not the mere question of lawkeeping, but it was the keeping of the heart turned toward God. There might come a time when the hands might not be able to present an offering for the altar, and the feet might not be able to travel to the appointed place of worship, but the heart could travel the short path that leads to God. The true Apostles' Creed is in the words that follow: "Because if thou shalt confess with thy mouth Jesus as Lord, and shalt believe in thy heart that God raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved." It is short and simple and definite. To confess Christ is to believe in the atonement he has made by offering himself in our place. We may believe in the fact, and find peace in believing, though we may not understand the mysteries which gather about it.

Let us not overlook the fact that while it is with the mouth and the life that we confess Christ, it is with the heart we believe. We are apt to approach religion as a science to be dealt with intellectually, whereas it lies in the sphere of the heart. It is a science, but it is a good deal more—it is an experience. Modern philosophers attach much importance to experience. They think less of speculation and inference, and recognize more the common experience and consciousness of mankind. The heart has perceptions, intuitions, aspirations, experiences as valid as those of the intellect or the senses, and more and more the heart is being trusted. The heart experiences are the most reliable and the best. It is not because we are expert in the sciences that we can take in the beauty and splendor that is coming upon us in the wealth of blossom and verdure of the springtime. The heart of a child leaps up when it beholds a rainbow in the sky. It is not a question in optics, but a simple heart experience. And so the gospel truth comes to us, not as an elaborately reasoned system, but the apprehension of certain blessed facts which are as clear to our mental and spiritual comprehension as a sunbeam. We are not saved by passing an examination in theology, but by faith in the word of the Lord.

Paul not only emphasizes the clearness of this message of salvation, but he puts emphasis upon its nearness. We do not have to ask, "Who shall ascend into heaven, to bring Christ down; or who shall descend into the abyss, to bring Christ up again from the dead?" No such difficult, impossible things are required. The word of mercy is "in thy mouth," to recite it, and "in thy heart," to welcome it. The best things are always near. The things that are far away we can do without; what we really need is within our reach. Peasants tell us that in every locality where man lives there may be found, on the hillsides and along the streams, the plants with which to heal and cure all diseases known to that region. We do not know, but this is true, that we do not have to go a long distance to find the grace of God. We may journey far for many things, but not for salvation. "The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth." We have been taught from our childhood the most solemn and blessed truths, and the lessons of our childhood, the Bible story with which we are so familiar, the words of the Lord Jesus, are in our mouths today. "And in thy heart." This is the great open secret of the universe, plain as the sun, open as the sky. The difficulty is not to find Christ, who comes near to each one of us; the difficulty is to avoid him.

Let us take the third thought—the freeness of this salvation. It is at these three points, the clearness, the nearness, the freeness of salvation, that men stumble. They look for mystery, and stumble over simplicity. They picture to themselves a far-away God, and stumble over the thought of the Father in the midst of his children, bearing their prayers, listening to their songs, helping them in their difficulties, comforting them in their troubles, guiding and keeping them all along the way. Men stumble over the freeness of salvation. It exacts no price, it imposes no hard conditions; it is not something we may hope to gain by hard endeavor, or by merit of our own. All we have to do or can do is to submit and believe and accept. It is not the righteousness which is by law, but the righteousness which is by faith. Christ did not come to destroy the law, but to fulfill it—to fill it full. We have a sacrifice, not that which man offers to God, but the sacrifice which God offers for man. There is a Priest who stands between God and man, to bring man and God together. There is a law, but it is the law of God's infinite and blessed love. The flowers are not springing up to beseech the shining of the sun; it is because the sun has been shining day after day and bathing with warmth the winter-clad earth that the flowers are springing up from the earth. It is not through altar and priest and sacrifice that we must find God; we must believe his word, in all its clearness and nearness and easiness to believe. With the truth before our eyes we must believe in our hearts that it is true. There is no subject that God has made so plain and easy to understand as the faith that saves; and there is no subject that men have so beclouded and confused. All that any man can do is to take God at his word, and find peace in believing. "The word is nigh thee, in thy mouth, and in thy heart—the word of faith, which we preach; because if thou shalt confess with thy mouth Jesus as Lord, and shalt believe with thy heart that God raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved."—Pittsburgh Christian Advocate.

The Historical Roots of Quakerism

BY ELBERT RUSSELL

I.

Introduction

In previous articles we have shown that the Quaker movement was, chronologically and logically, the culmination of the Reformation. We now turn our attention to its historical antecedents.

Quakerism, like the Anglo-Saxon civilization of which it is the finest flower, has a complex ancestry. It did not spring full-grown from the mind of one man, nor was it the outgrowth of the experience of a single sect or age. All the important elements of which it is made up, whether of doctrine, discipline, or practice, were in existence in the thought and life of England in the seventeenth century, and had already a long history. George Fox's original contributions to Quakerism were a unifying idea, an organizing experience, and a dynamic personality. The various elements that went into it had been tested out in the strenuous experience of those sects, which from time to time since the days of the early Church had raised protests against conventional religion, and staking their all on some phase of vital religion, had found it satisfying. To trace the genesis and development of these various roots of Quakerism is our present concern.

Without attempting a rigidly scientific classification,—since no hard and fast lines can be drawn,—it will be convenient to divide these ancestral lines of Quakerism into three groups: the Biblical, the Mystical, and the Calvinistic sects.

The Biblical Sects

Under this head we may group a number of sects, widely diverse in origin, but all having in common the effort to ignore as much as possible the historical forms of Christianity and to reconstruct the life and worship of the Church on the basis of the Bible, especially of the New Testament.

George Fox and his co-laborers did not claim to be the original authors of their message. They insisted that it was only "primitive Christianity revived." From childhood the first Friends had been familiar with the English Bible, either in the Geneva or King James version. They had heard it read, expounded, and discussed in home, pulpit and market-place. George Fox spent many hours alone with his Bible in his young manhood, while seeking satisfaction for his spiritual needs. This seems at first sight a sufficient explanation of the fact that many of the elements of his system seem natural and simple reproductions of the teaching of Jesus and the practices of the apostolic church, as recorded in the New Testament. Such are the spontaneous mystical worship, the prophetic ministry, the democratic organization, the freedom and importance given to women, the avoidance of war and oaths, the social love, and the willingness to suffer rather than disobey God at the command of men.

But when we have noted these correspondences we have not fully explained why early Friends adopted precisely the beliefs and practices they did. The New Testament had been in the possession of the Church from the apostolic age. All the Protestant sects,—Lutherans, Anglicans, Presbyterians, Independents, and Baptists alike,—claimed to have revised or reconstructed the Church on the basis of the Bible. The question remains: why did Fox and his Friends find in the same Bible a different notion of what primitive Christianity was? To this question no absolute answer can be given, since human motives and decisions are more or less elusive and incalculable. Nevertheless we feel sure the answer must be found in the fact that early Friends were under influences which led in the direction of the Quaker system, that George Fox and his followers fell heir to the Biblical interpretation of certain historical sects.

The most important of these Biblical sects are the Waldenses, the Lollards, and the Anabaptists.

The Waldenses

The Waldenses are the first in time and last in perceptible influence upon the founders of the Society of Friends. By the twelfth century of our era, the Church had become elaborately organized and very corrupt. There had grown up a priesthood and a system of sacraments to mediate between the soul and God. Worship had become a matter of elaborate rites, and faith and blind acceptance of a highly philosophical creed. Conduct was regulated according to a mixture of Jewish, Roman and Christian ethics, and the papal power had become supreme in church and state. In the twelfth century also, there began to appear a number of sects seeking simpler and more vital forms of Christianity, and protesting against the spiritual emptiness and corruption of the Church.

The soil for the growth of these sects had been prepared by a movement that dated back to the third century. While Christianity was spreading in the Roman Empire many attempts were made to combine it with existing systems of thought and life, such as Greek philosophy and Persian dualism. The latter was very widely diffused in the Empire by the third century. Its cardinal principle was that good and evil, light and darkness, Spirit and matter, were eternal and engaged in perpetual struggle for the mastery, both in the world and in man. In the third century, a Persian named Mani combined this dualism with Christianity and certain other elements into a system called Manichaeism. It had a great influence on the Church in the succeeding centuries, and although it was denounced as heresy by the Church and its adherents were severely persecuted, it was never wholly stamped out. We find traces of it in Europe in the ninth century, and in the twelfth it reappeared in the cities of western Europe in a revised form under the name of Catharism.

The strange philosophy of Catharism, that made the devil coeternal with God, and its crude ascetic morality were mainly confined to the "perfect," who were initiated into the esoteric doctrines of the sect. The mass of adherents, "the believers," understood only the insistence of the Cathari upon purity of life, simplicity of worship, and opposition to priestly privileges and ecclesiastical usurpations. To the populace Catharism appeared simply as a reforming movement, upholding the Scriptures against ecclesiastical traditions and corruptions. Scattered about the cities of Europe the Cathari formed nuclei of anti-ecclesiastical sentiment, the culture in which developed the purer religious aspirations of the age and out of which crystallized many abortive movements of reform. Among the Catharist ideas most significant for our present study are the following: "They stoutly opposed oaths. They condemned war, and they held that punishment by death was wicked. They contended not only against infant baptism, but against water baptism altogether, even asserting that this rite was introduced by Satan who used John the Baptist as his instrument. They pointed out that in apostolic times those who had received water baptism were still imperfect until they had received the Holy Ghost. They carried their opposition to external things to the point of holding that God dwells not in houses made with hands. A house of stone is not a church; a company of good persons only is the church." (Jones' Studies in Mystical Religion, page 135.)

There is nothing to show that the founder of the Waldenses was directly connected with the Cathari. But the minstrel and "spiritual adviser" who started him on his religious course were probably under Catharist influences. The territory from which he drew his disciples and in which he did his most effective work, had been planted for his gathering by the Catharist movement.

The founder of the Waldenses was Peter Waldo, a wealthy merchant, of Lyons, France. About 1173 A.D. he was profoundly impressed by seeing a friend fall dead at his side. Shortly afterward he heard a minstrel singing in the street, lamenting the corrupt condition of the Church in contrast with its former purity. Waldo took the minstrel home with him, and was so impressed by his conversation that he went next day to consult a spiritual adviser who told him the surest way to heaven was to sell all that he had and give to the poor and follow Jesus. Waldo took the words literally. From this time his aim was to order his life according to the literal teaching of Christ in the Gospels. He visited the poor and talked with groups of men in the shops and on the streets, showing them "through the Scriptures the simplicity of the Gospel message and the character of the primitive church." He had a translation of parts of the Bible made into the popular tongue, and organized his followers into bands who called themselves the "Poor Men of Lyons," and who went about preaching and reading the Bible in public.

The movement soon came under the ban of the Church, and opposition drove Waldo's followers into a closer brotherhood, who drew more largely from the popular phases of Catharism. They insisted on purity of life and "were determined to practice their religion." Their social feeling was strongly marked. At times they addressed one another as "Friend." They shared one another's suffering and sorrows. Their ministers cared for the sick and poor. They received only food and clothing for their labor, and often worked with their hands.

The organization of the Waldenses was thoroughly democratic. They insisted that everybody, even laymen and women, could preach and perform the sacraments. They maintained that impurity of life in priests rendered their ministrations invalid. They taught that prayer, even in a stable, is as efficacious as in a church. They were opposed to war, oaths, and capital punishment.

The Waldenses were nearly exterminated by the Inquisition and by the Albigensian Crusade in the thirteenth century, but a remnant remained in the fastnesses of the Vaudois Alps and the Piedmont. In 1650 persecution broke out against them afresh. An army composed of French troops, assisted by Irish soldiers whom Cromwell had driven out of Ireland, invaded the Waldensian valleys and spread desolation on every side. The barbarities practiced against the Waldenses aroused Protestant Europe to vigorous protest to the French king and the Duke of Savoy. England was especially stirred by these atrocities and Cromwell joined in the protest. Milton, who conducted the correspondence as the Latin secretary of Cromwell, wrote his vigorous sonnet on "The Late Massacre in the Piedmont." Large sums of money were collected in England to aid the Waldensian remnant.

These events made known to all England the peculiarities of the Waldenses, who were then generally supposed to be a survival of primitive Christianity uncorrupted by the Romish Church. They emphasized in susceptible minds in England the idea of restoring New Testament Christianity after the Waldensian model. These events happened just in the years of George Fox's early preaching, when his ideas were taking shape, when he was searching the New Testament for the true religion. At the same time the little groups of Seekers and kindred sects, which formed the nucleus of his Society, were in a plastic state as to the practices of true Christianity.

The Waldenses were not a mystical sect, as were the Friends, but their ideas of the true Church and their religious practices coincide, as we have seen, in many points with those of early Friends. While George Fox nowhere mentions the Waldenses, yet directly or indirectly, the wide-spread interest in them must have helped crystallize his convictions and the convictions of many to whom he preached, as to what a revival of primitive Christianity would be.

The Training of Christian Workers

BY ISAAC SHARPLESS

One of the first of George Fox's "Openings" was that "being bred at Oxford or Cambridge was not necessary to make a man a Minister of the Gospel." Some of his followers changed that word "necessary" to "desirable" and placed a premium on ignorance. A man's mind was supposed to be so filled with his worldly learning that there was no place for the spiritual guidance. They did not perceive that the ignorant man's mind was often just as full as the scholar's, but that the filling was probably illogical, notional and sometimes unreasonable. That a man without ideas could as a rule preach better than one with trained faculties and abundant material was a strange perversion of George Fox's original idea.

Yet now when the pendulum has swung somewhat the other way, it is well to recur to the statement as Fox made it, that the training is not "necessary"; that many a man and woman without it has had God's message given him and that the organization of a Friends' meeting should be so elastic as to allow of its delivery.

But there are very few cases where the effect of the message will not be increased by well chosen words, natural tones and gestures and appropriate illustrations. We may readily assume that the Divine illumination is essential and that no man ought to attempt to preach without it. But I suppose it is very seldom the case that that illumination takes the form of dictation of words and sentences. It is rather an inspiration of ideas, and the shape in which those ideas are presented, the arguments and illustrations and verbiage, are produced by the intellect, and are good or bad in proportion to the natural powers and training of the man.

The Friends Meeting is no place for "pulpit oratory" as commonly interpreted. What is wanted is a simple, quiet, impressive delivery, without any straining for effect. But this is just the thing hardest to acquire. It does not usually come easily and naturally.

But there are now fortunately many other forms of church activity besides preaching. The great field of Social Service is opening up as a possible opportunity for many young men and women who have no call for the exercise of the public ministry. As a profession it is as well rewarded as teaching, and as an opportunity for real usefulness its career is unexcelled. It needs training both general and special. It needs a sympathetic heart and willing hands. It needs consecration to the cause of Christ and is a legitimate ally to the distinctly formal church exercises. No one whether he goes into it as a professional or an amateur can afford to neglect the modern methods and ideas which cluster around its teaching. They relate to prevention rather than cure. They study the causes of poverty, crime, prostitution and decadence, and the effective methods of relief when relief is necessary. Whether "being bred at college" is or is not essential to a minister of God's word, it undoubtedly is to the best social worker.

From some such causes as these there is a renewed desire for Christian training of an effective sort, under leading men who are both reverent and scholarly. The Theological schools furnish this in large measure. But in many cases they are so alien to the Quaker idea of a free ministry, a ministry of which the Divine Call is the basis and the exceeding great necessity, and which leads into the meeting open to the spontaneous impulses of the Holy Spirit, and in which also the mercenary professional idea is rigidly kept in the background, that it is a matter of rather serious concern whether this patronage is not going to damage certain fundamental things in Quakerism on which we can appeal to the world of thinking, serious men.

For some such reasons as these the Quaker colleges would seem the proper place for the education of the majority of our young Friends who desire to become Christian workers. If enlightened instruction in Biblical truth, philosophic principle and modern sociology, can be given by men of real authority, solid orthodoxy and vital Quaker ideals, there ought to be a strength resulting to our Society which would solve many of our problems.

The Great Needs of Christian Work in Japan

BY HORACE E. COLEMAN

An erroneous opinion seems to have become quite current in America that because Japan has risen to the place of a first-class power, therefore she is able to take care of her own people religiously, and that there is no further need of missionaries. In fact, such opinions were expressed by a very few Christian workers in Japan within the past few years. In recent years, however, such opinions have disappeared, and even the most hopeful Japanese leaders now recognize that the task is too great for the Japanese church, and that an addition to the present missionary force is even necessary.

In Japan in 1911 the Conference of Federated Missions appointed a Committee on Distribution of Forces, "to study thoroughly the problem of the increase of Christian forces in Japan" looking forward to a fuller evangelistic occupation of the country so that the people may have a reasonable opportunity to hear the gospel.

This Committee has been carrying on this study for the last three years and its study has showed a very large and unreached territory, particularly in the rural districts, constituting approximately eighty percent. of the total population, where as yet, little work has been done. It has found that the building up and the strengthening of the individual Japanese churches promise to engage the attention of the several Japanese bodies, so that there is little prospect of making any great advance towards occupying new territory in the future. There are practically forty million people of Japan who are yet unreached with the Christian message.

At the time of the Continuation Committee Conference in Tokyo in April last year, the Joint Conference of the Japanese and Missionary workers came to the following conclusions:

First: The unreached forty millions of the rural population, together with the unevangelized masses of the cities and towns, where work has been established, constitute still a gigantic, though inspiring, task to the Church at large in its call to give the Gospel to the whole Japanese people.

Second: This work calls for large reinforcements. Four times the present number of Japanese evangelistic workers are required to put in the field one worker to approximately ten thousand people, and at this stage of our enterprise a proportion less than the above would hardly suffice as a proper goal of effort. Moreover, both for specialized work in the larger cities and particularly for work in smaller towns, a considerable increase in the number of missionaries is demanded. The call from the several district conferences which had in view actual centers to be occupied, totaled a little less than five hundred additional missionaries (wives included), as the minimum required to meet the evangelistic need at the present time.

On account of the above findings of the Committee on Distribution of Forces, the following resolution was adopted at the annual meeting of the Conference of Federated Missions of January, 1914:

Resolution: "That the Executive Committee of this body be requested to appoint from among the missionaries expecting to be on furlough the coming year, a strong representative committee who shall officially present to the missionary Societies, the Conference of Boards, the Student Volunteer Movement, the Executive Committee of the Layman's Missionary Movement, and to such other organizations as may be deemed necessary, the urgent needs of the evangelistic work in this country."

In accordance with this resolution, the following Committee was appointed:

H. E. Coleman, Chairman, Bloomington, Indiana; H. B. Benninghoff, Valparaiso, Indiana; H. W. Schwartz, 5616 Kimbark, Ave., Chicago; G. W. Bouldin, Scottsboro, Alabama; H. B. Newell, 2042 E. 115th St., Cleveland, Ohio; J. M. Baldwin, 225 Confederation Life Bldg., E. Toronto, Canada; J. C. Worley, Pasadena, California; Dr. Sidney L. Gulick, 41 Beacon St., Boston; E. H. Zaugg, 637 N. West St., Lima, Ohio; A. D. Berry, Mexico, New York; H. H. Munroe, 154 Fifth Ave., N., Nashville, Tennessee; E. T. Iglehart, Katonah, New York; B. F. Shiveley, Beaver St., McKeesport, Pennsylvania; R. M. Milliman, 10 McMastes Avenue, Toronto, Canada.

The members of this Committee while on furlough, will be very glad, to the extent of their time and strength, to make presentations of the needs of Christian work in Japan before churches, missionary societies and other organizations.

We have given their names and addresses so that any such organizations who wish their help may be able to communicate with them.

Indianapolis Evangelistic Campaign

BY MORTON C. PEARSON, EXECUTIVE SECRETARY

In the month of January, 1913, the Ministerial Association of Indianapolis and the Committee on Evangelism in the Church Federation of the city jointly decided to conduct a Simultaneous Evangelistic Campaign in the city to begin with the week of prayer in January, 1914, and to continue with services during the Holy Week and on Easter Sunday, April 12th. The evangelistic services beginning with the week of prayer continued in each church a period of two weeks or longer as the interest justified. Following this the churches engaged in organized work along lines of personal work, Sunday School, family visitation and personal interviews with men and women relative to uniting with the church.

In addition to the January meetings held in more than 100 churches each night, a large mass meeting was held for a period of ten days at noon each day in Keith's Theatre where the attendance ranged from 700 to 1,900 persons daily.

The entire movement culminated in the observance of Passion Week, beginning Palm Sunday and closing Easter Day. During this week the churches of the city were open every night, and at noon each day, another series of mass meetings was held in Keith's Theatre where the attendance ranged from 600 to 1,400 persons. The speakers at all these Keith Theatre meetings were Indianapolis ministers with the exception of one.

The campaign was all the more significant because the meetings from the first to last were in charge of local pastors, they being their own evangelists. The results of the January meetings culminated in the reception of 2,500 people into membership on "Church Membership Day," which was observed by all the churches on February 1, 1914. "Church-going Sunday" was observed on January 11, when more than 110,000 persons attended services in the Protestant Churches. The Passion Week services closed on Easter Day with the reception of about 1,000 persons into church membership, making a total of 3,500 people received into the churches of the city since January 1, 1914.

This movement has been looked upon as the greatest evangelistic movement ever held in the city of Indianapolis. The entire city has been quickened, the churches have been united, and religion and the church have been brought into prominence as never before.

The Church Federation has demonstrated its efficiency by serving as a leader in this entire campaign, the Executive Committee voting to release its Secretary, M. C. Pearson, from other duties that he might give largely of his time to directing the activities of the entire campaign. So happy are the ministers over the great blessing which has fallen upon the churches of the city as the result of this movement, that in their April meeting they, with the Federation, voted unanimously for a similar movement for the year 1914-15.

Current Items of Interest to Friends

BALTIMORE YEARLY MEETING

Baltimore.—The extensive social and religious work which has continued at Light Street, Baltimore, since 1863, bids fair to be much more effective than in recent years. The Friends of that congregation voluntarily communicated to the Monthly Meeting their willingness to assume responsibility for some of the branches of work that have heretofore been carried by members of the Eutaw Street congregation. The social features of their work will probably be opened upon a new basis next fall and new workers from their own ranks enlisted. The outlook is encouraging.

Baltimore Monthly Meeting has recently made a change in the organization of its committee work, having classified all its activities into six groups with a small organizing committee in charge of each. It has also established an Efficiency Committee of three persons, charging them with the constant review of the entire organized work of the Monthly Meeting with a view to securing the most effective service.

Lincoln, Virginia.—A Sunday evening meeting under the auspices of a Monthly Meeting Committee has been maintained during the winter at Lincoln, Virginia, for the benefit of the students boarding in the village who attend the high school. The plan has proved successful.

Corinth, Virginia.—Corinth Academy commencement occurred on April 24th, at which time three young men were graduated. On the previous evening the literary society presented an entertaining Riley program and in the forenoon of commencement day a farmers' meeting was held, and a masterly address on Scientific Farming was given by the head of the State Truck Experiment Station. Following the reading of graduation essays by members of the class, Mr. Scarborough, editor of a county newspaper, gave the commencement address, an appropriate climax to the occasion. The Academy has had a successful year under the principalship of C. Emmett Trueblood.

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING

Wabash.—Sunday evening, May 3d, was the closing service of an eighteen days meeting in South Wabash Friends' Church. Lindley A. Wells and Leora Bogue had charge of the services. Brother Wells felt specially led to give most of his messages to the church, with the result that a number of Friends received their inheritance—the sanctification of their hearts. Brother Wells endeared himself to the hearts of our young Friends in this meeting. His tender and earnest messages on full salvation brought to many of their hearts a hunger that was soon satisfied as they knelt at the altar. A few people were reclaimed during the meeting. The last night of the meeting brought us to the beginning of a revival. While some Friends in this meeting did not seem to realize what opportunities for the Church were at hand, we are glad to report that a number are fully awakened to a prayerful concern for the work of the Lord. Leora Bogue proved a great blessing to the meeting. Her lead in song and personal work was gratifying. How much our Yearly Meeting needs the service of such sane and definite preachers and evangelists as Brother Wells! We must get back to the old paths. Our neglect of honoring the doctrine of the Baptism of the Holy Spirit, the true message of Quakerism, as we ought to throughout our Yearly Meeting, has brought a dearth in Zion, and a crying need and hunger among our people.

Chester.—May 3d was Missionary day at the Chester Meeting, and services were held morning, afternoon and night. Among the visitors who participated were E. Gurney Hill and Dr. George and Belle C. Bailey, of Richmond, and Elma Charles and Alice Hunt, of Fountain City. It was a profitable day, and considerable interest was aroused in the cause of missions.

Just at the adjournment of the morning session, the home of Richard Sims, half a mile away, was found to be on fire. The loss was well nigh complete, and many relics, pictures and furniture were destroyed that were priceless because of their associations. Arrangements are being made to rebuild as soon as possible.

KANSAS YEARLY MEETING

Kansas City, Missouri.—A Junior Christian Endeavor Society has been organized with Miss Sydney Hinshaw as superintendent and Miss Margaret Hobbs assistant.

The May Festival will be held the week of May 24th. The general plan of last year will be followed. Sunday morning will be a special rallying time for the Sunday School, and it is hoped that all attendance records will be broken. On Sunday evening the biblical cantata "Queen Esther" will be sung by a large chorus.

Pastors' Alliance.—The Pastors' Alliance of Kansas Yearly Meeting will be held at Wichita, June 8-11. Those desiring entertainment should write W. E. Larson, 626 South Millwood, Wichita, Kansas. The program will be given space next week.

NEW YORK YEARLY MEETING

Chappaqua.—Purchase Quarterly Meeting was held at Chappaqua, Westchester County, New York, on May 2. Tom Jones, the Secretary of the Board of Young Friends' Activities of the Five Years Meeting, was present, and spoke with helpfulness in the morning meeting. His appearance and address made a very favorable impression on the Meeting, although he had spent the night in travel, and had but very little sleep. Following the meeting for worship the business meeting was held, and resolutions expressing sympathy with President Wilson in the present Mexican difficulty in which he has found himself, and the hope for a speedy and peaceable issue, as well as resolutions requesting our senators and congressmen to vote for the constitutional amendment prohibiting the liquor traffic were passed. The new method of raising money for the Beneficences Budget for New York Yearly Meeting seems to have proved a success, as the proportion allotted to Purchase Quarterly Meeting was slightly over-subscribed.

After the Quarterly Meeting luncheon had been served in the Sunday-school room, at which a pleasant social opportunity was had, an afternoon meeting in the interest of young Friends was held. Tom Jones made a very forceful and effective address and appeal for the sympathy and interest of our young Friends. A number of cards were distributed upon which young Friends were requested to write certain information as to name, age and interest, and the meeting closed with a feeling of enthusiasm for the work of the young Friends' secretary.

OHIO YEARLY MEETING

Ypsilanti, Michigan.—Adrian Quarterly Meeting was held at Ypsilanti, May 1-3. The visiting ministers were Edward Mott, of Cleveland, Ohio, and Lloyd East, of Vandalia Quarter, Indiana Yearly Meeting. On Seventh-day Edward Mott preached a much-needed sermon on the humanity of Christ, from Heb. 2: 14, together with the context. There is much said of the Deity of Christ in these days, but his humanity is also an important part of gospel truth. He "was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death," and it is by his death that he delivers men from the devil and the fear of death. He was "made like unto his brethren," but his brethren are not sinners, but those who are sanctified by him (Verse 11).

On First-day Daniel Whybrew spoke on Heb. 11: 24-26, on "The recompense of reward" for serving God, and Moses' choice between that and "the pleasures of sin for a season." On First-day afternoon there was a Bible School Conference, addressed by Edward Mott. His subject was the Bible.

WESTERN YEARLY MEETING

First Church, Indianapolis.—One of the pleasant social features in connection with the First Friends' Sunday School was a banquet given at the Y. W. C. A., Friday evening, May 1st, at which the members of the Men's Bible Class were guests of the Women's Bible Class, the occasion being the result of a campaign for attendance. A delightful program followed the supper. One of the guests of honor was Albert J. Brown, former pastor of the church.

W. O. Trueblood, pastor of First Friends' Church, is giving a series of Sunday night sermons on the subject of Character Building, and the different phases of this very interesting theme are being discussed in an extremely forceful and profitable manner.

WILMINGTON YEARLY MEETING

Wilmington.—At the session of Center Quarterly Meeting, May 2d, the clerk was directed to write a letter to the president of the United States expressing sympathy for him in these trying times, and a firm confidence in his sincerity in his efforts to maintain peace with all nations, and a prayer that the Heavenly Father might comfort, strengthen and guide him, and hasten the day when "the shadow of death" may be turned into "the morning."

David E. Sampson and wife attended Durham Quarterly Meeting, England, April 15 and 16. From there they went on to Kendal, where they attended Westmorland Quarterly Meeting. On Sabbath morning, the 19th, they attended the meeting at Brigflatts. David Sampson is having acceptable service at all these places.

PERSONAL MENTION

Lewis E. Stout, who has been pastor of Friends' University Church at Wichita, Kansas, for five years, has been called to the pastorate at Carmel, Indiana.

Edgar H. Stranahan, of Wichita, Kansas, attended services at Kansas City, Missouri, on May 3. He has recently been chosen president of the Kansas State Sunday School Union.

E. J. Carter, who has served as pastor at Plainfield, Indiana, for two years, has been given a call by the meeting for another year, but there is a possibility that he will not remain in pastoral service.

Anna B. and Henrietta M. Thomas, of Baltimore, sailed on May 5th for England with the expectation of remaining for sixteen months. They will be greatly missed in local and Yearly Meeting work.

President David M. Edwards, of Penn College, spent a day or two the early part of last week at Richmond, Indiana, and conducted chapel exercises at Earlham College. He went on East on a trip in the interests of the Church.

E. Emmett Trueblood and wife, principal and matron of Corinth Academy, Southampton County, Virginia, sailed on April 28th for England, where they will enroll for the summer term at Woodbrooke. They will return about August 1st.

Alonzo E. Cloud, who for the past seven years has lived near Corinth Meeting, Virginia, is moving this summer to Sedley Meeting, seven miles distant. He will continue from that point his visitation work as Quarterly Meeting Secretary.

Professor Harlow Lindley, of Earlham College, is director of the department of Indiana History and Archives of the Indiana State Library. He asks the co-operation of all in the effort to collect all books and pamphlets relating to Indiana; all writings of Indiana authors; private manuscripts; old and current files of Indiana periodicals; in short, anything which will be of valuable information relative to the activities of the state.

Horace E. Coleman, missionary at Tokyo, Japan, started home with his family on May 6th. After spending a week in Honolulu and a few days on the Pacific coast, they expect to reach Bloomingdale, Indiana, about the 6th of June. They expect to spend the summer in Indiana, and in the autumn Horace Coleman expects to take a special course of study at Union and Columbia in New York City, except about two months spent in Philadelphia.

ACADEMY CONTEST

The annual contest in oration and declamation held by Fairmount, Plainfield, Bloomingdale and Vermilion Academies was held May 1st at Vermilion Grove, Illinois. Park Pender, of Bloomingdale, took first place in oration with the subject "Our Duty to the Foreigners." Dale Mills, of Vermilion, with "Unguarded Gates," took second place. The winning declamation "How the Larue Stakes were Lost," was given by Audrey Church, of Bloomingdale; the declamation receiving second place, "The Going of the White Swan," was given by Elvira Morgan, of Vermilion.

The judges on the thought and composition of the orations were Leroy Jones, of Oak Grove Seminary; Marjorie Hill Allee, Williamstown, Massachusetts, and Anna Eves, of Penn College. Those on delivery were Walter Woodard, Earlham College; Thomas B. Stanley, Illinois University, and John B. Wisely, Indiana State Normal School.

The Field Meet on Saturday was won by Bloomingdale athletes with Fairmount's boys winning a very close second. In business session the principals of the Academies unanimously expressed the feeling that there is need of a closer bond of unity among the Friends' academies of Indiana and Illinois, and consequently voted to invite Spiceland Academy into the League and to hold a business meeting sometime during the summer to discuss and formulate definite plans for securing such unity.

EVERY MEMBER CANVASS

The Mooresville, Indiana, congregation made an every-member canvass on April 5th; $125.84 was subscribed on the weekly basis.

Gilead Friends' Meeting, Ohio Yearly Meeting, made a personal canvass for missions alone early in the year. The work was taken up commencing with a sermon by the pastor, George E. Kent, on Sabbath morning, followed by subscriptions made on pledge cards. This was followed immediately by a personal canvass of all the membership by visits to local members and correspondence with those residing at a distance. The results were that the amount for this year was double that of last year, which was also very good. The pastor's salary is paid regularly every week, and since the canvass was made there has been between $400.00 and $500.00 raised for church repair work. The secret of it all is that every member gave at least something. The totals were very satisfactory.

The Westtown Letter

OUTDOOR RECREATION

Westtown gives a great deal of attention to outdoor recreation. Ample provision is made for competitive sports, although the emphasis is placed on the exercise obtained by daily play rather than on the successful performance of the first team in match games. Much attention is also given to outdoor pleasures of the non-competitive sort: skating and coasting in their seasons, and country walks, Natural History trips and Camp Suppers on Seventh-day afternoons and at odd times.

Largely through the efforts of the Old Scholars' Association, there are excellent grounds for baseball, cricket, soccer, and tennis for the boys, and tennis and hockey for the girls. During the open season each boy who is physically fit and who is not doing outdoor work takes his place in some regular games four afternoons a week. The match games usually come at times that will not interfere with the regular play.

On a pleasant afternoon in open weather of one hundred boys perhaps thirty-six will be playing baseball, twenty will be at cricket, twenty at tennis and the rest doing garden work, or cutting wood, or walking.

The girls also have required exercise in tennis and hockey outdoors, and basketball in the gymnasium. The physical directors carefully supervise all these games, and also conduct the gymnasium classes during the cold weather, the girls using the regular gymnasium and the boys the open shed by Industrial Hall.

Winter sports are a great feature in Westtown life. As soon as our lake is well frozen over we begin to skate on the shallow end, moving our boundary line further and further down as the ice thickens till the whole surface is thrown into use. Twelve acres of ice give ample room for all possible demands.

We encourage the children to make themselves good skaters by giving them lists of figures to practice, and regularly examining them when they are sufficiently expert. While there are regions of skating which we never approach, yet as skaters commonly go, Westtown people make a very presentable appearance.

Our Lake is much sheltered and is never swept by freshets, so that the ice usually lasts all winter. When the snow comes we scrape it off, and where the ice is rough we plane it, so that we count on having skating pretty nearly all the time in cold weather.

When the snow falls to any depth the boys turn out and make the sledding track. They tramp it down and haul water on it in tubs and soak it and smooth it, and the next morning we have a hard, sleek track, running from the girls' wing down one hill, and up a short rise, and then down again through the woods and out on the ice of the Lake, when this is sufficiently strong, in all a full quarter of a mile. As the track wears out it is repaired as long as the snow lasts. Careful regulation prevents nearly all of the accidents which so often mar this exciting sport.

For many years Westtown coasting was mainly done with large bob-sleds, but now the use of flexible fliers is nearly universal. The rush and sweep of the great sleds was certainly exhilarating, but the smaller fliers go fast enough, and are far safer.

Both skating and coasting are essentially social sports, and are greatly enjoyed by the pupils. The teachers rejoice in them also, not only for the pleasure of participation but because of the natural outlet they afford for the children's spirits. The inside school life never runs more smoothly than when there is a good coasting track or a fine sheet of ice.

Camp suppers have long been a pleasant part of Westtown life. On Seventh-day afternoons in fall and spring parties of from ten to twenty-five will start out, sometimes for the north end of the Farm, and sometimes for picturesque places several miles distant. They carry the materials for an ample supper, and utensils for cooking and eating it. When the camp ground is reached they build a long fireplace of stones, get out their boilers and frying pans, and prepare a hot supper, ample and toothsome. After the girls have satisfied themselves, or the boys have eaten everything in sight, for these trips are separate, the evening fire is built up and the party gathers around it with song and story until it is time to take the homeward tramp.

A great many walks are taken which do not involve a supper out. A teacher may take a small party to the scene of the battle of the Brandywine, to the "magnet quarry," or to the haunts of rarer plants. The older boys are encouraged to take walks by themselves, usually in groups with an appointed leader. It gives them fine exercise, shows them our interesting country, and develops their sense of responsibility.

The making of canoes in the shop has been going on for many years, while the using of them on the Lake dates back only two years when the Lake and Lake House were constructed. The boys and girls have separate times twice a week for canoeing, always under careful supervision; although only those who are good swimmers have this privilege. The school endeavors to take no risk in such matters. The swimming pool is open all the term, except in the coldest weather, and all who cannot swim are encouraged and helped to learn.

Quite a number of the boys take their exercise by working. They take care of the teachers' lawns and gardens, or saw wood and do chores. They often work for the School in raking leaves, cutting wood, and helping in the garden. In connection with the new department of Orchards and Forests there will be an increased opportunity for working where the experience gained may be worth as much as the actual remuneration.

Our new Catalogue for 1913-14 is now printed, and will be gladly sent to any who will ask for it.

AN APPEAL FOR PEACE

Philadelphia Yearly Meeting at its recent session appointed a committee to send an appeal in behalf of peace to the proprietors and editors of the newspaper press of the United States, asking that these periodicals use their influence against war. The appeal, which has been sent to about 2,500 newspapers, deals with the peace question in general and with the Mexican situation in particular. It closes with the following paragraph:

“Meanwhile, the United States should cease its menacing attitude and should strive to reassure the Mexican people and all other nations that it has not suddenly entered upon a career of conquest or forsaken utterly the principles it has so often professed; namely, that reasonable and peaceful means of settling international disputes be exhausted before there is any thought of force, and that the same consideration be given to a weak nation as to a strong one.”

A Message

BESS LOUISE McDOWELL

Time's cycle moved again to Spring;
Awakened all in bloom,
The dainty clusters wafted out
Their sweet and rich perfume,
From every branch and every twig
They hung in fine array,
And as we stood in wonder bound,
These words they seemed to say:

"If all the blossoms on the tree
To ripened fruit should grow,
The laden branches all must break,
And cast their burdens low;
'Tis better far that some should die
That others perfect be,
And by their death the tree be spared
For years, a fruitful tree."

And then as thoughts came surging on,
And aspirations rose
For mighty works and kindly deeds
That loving action knows,
The little blossom spoke again:
"'Tis worthy to aspire;
But God's design for flesh was not
To toil and never tire.

"Some deeds must needs be left undone
That others may mature,
And when the harvest-time shall come
Be worthy to endure;
And then in God's Eternity,
In yon bright, happy Land,
It may be there you may complete
What here you have but planned."

Ministerial Conference

The Ministerial Conference of Western Yearly Meeting met at Plainfield, Indiana, May 5 and 6, 1914. The opening was at 2:00 o'clock on Tuesday afternoon. Devotional exercises were conducted by David Hadley. He emphasized the thought of each being prepared for the work of the Master, always manifesting determination and strength and ever ready to go at the Lord's bidding.

Next was a discussion of "Brotherhood in the Friends' Church," by Clyde O. Watson. He said brotherhood deals with the layman. Change in methods and ways of working necessitates different organizations. One function of brotherhood is responsibility. Others are to develop the laymen, to make church work practical, to encourage men who are outside, and to seek the lost. The demand of service from lay members is greater than ever before. Everyone is responsible for someone else.

"What Type of Pastor is Expected from Laymen" was presented by Murray S. Barker. Laymen expect the pastor to be a man or woman of faith, of large vision. The pastor should be to his people what a factory superintendent is to his men. He should be a judge of human nature, should demand results, and see that everyone is busy. He should spend energy on the children, as time and energy thus used will not be in vain.

Following this was "What Type of Laymen is Expected by the Pastor," considered by Simon Hester. Pastors should expect their congregations to be men and women of God, perfect members of the church, people that can be depended upon. They should believe in God and the saving power of Jesus, as well as in the fundamental doctrines of the church. They should sit at the feet of Jesus, be loyal to the church, and take part in things of the community. They should be persons in whom the Spirit of God is; should provide for the boys and girls in the church.

Discussion was opened by Edward M. Woodard. These are subjects of great importance, but the solution is still greater. The pastor should be a man or woman of general ideas, ordinary sense, posted in a general way; should take pride in doing little things; know the work, and be a student of it. The average man or woman has a tender place in his or her heart. Men can be won to Christ as never before. Stand by the pastor when he is doing right and help him when he is doing wrong.

The evening session opened with devotional exercises conducted by Thomas C. Brown. A leaderless meeting followed in which the Holy Spirit led different ones to take part.

The address of the evening was given by Amos W. Butler, Secretary State Board of Charities, on the subject "Least of These." He said this work was started by Friends. He made a strong plea for the children and spoke from the following outline: Children as 1. Truants; 2. Dependents; 3. Neglected; 4. Defective, and 5. Delinquent. The family home is the place for the child. Unlikely children sometimes make most likely men. The only way we can serve God is by serving our fellow men.

On Wednesday morning, a prayer and praise service was conducted by J. B. Stipp. Next followed a Bible Lesson, I. Timothy, by Lydia Hoath. The everlasting gospel was able to open eyes. Prayer is another phase of church life. Wait on God and guard against our weaknesses.

"The Church Survey" was considered by William J. Cleaver. Survey from the chief corner-stone, which is Christ. Ye are the corporation of Christ. Rural foundation is the mother of city churches. Most of the meetings in Western Yearly Meeting are in rural towns. Atmosphere of the church is essential to life and development.

Discussion was led by Jehu Reagan. In our rural districts we find the absence of landlords and an increase of tenants. There should be interest and deep concern to get these interested in the church of the community.

Next was the "Building of the Church," by Charles R. Axton. It was a review of the work of Jefferson. It is the Christian association that keeps the preacher alive. Young men of today have as high ideals as ever they have had, a desire to do something worth while. The church of Christ stands in the world as a movement of God's Truth. The building of brotherhood is a company of men and women whose interests are bound and intertwined. The preacher cannot preach to a loveless congregation. A divided church can never win others.

Discussion was led by Gertrude M. Reineir. The Church is the mightiest force that there is. Brotherhood is not a social organization, but a spiritual creation. The conference closed with a deep feeling of appreciation to our Heavenly Father for His presence and blessing and the sweet fellowship of believers.

Correlating Our Denominational Life

Within recent years a new spirit has apparently taken possession of the Church, a spirit born of an enlarged vision of Christian responsibility. The awakening world has found its counterpart in the awakening Church. The dominant note of this twentieth century thus far has been that of the obligations of Christian brotherhood in terms both of community and world life. Home and foreign missions are essentially one and both together constitute the great world program of evangelism, which must ever be the supreme passion of the Church of Jesus Christ.

Upon every hand are the evidences that the leaven of Christian duty is working a change in religious forms and organisms suited to the needs of a changing civilization. Federalism and solidarity have succeeded individualism and disunity. In its corporate capacity the Church is apparently striving as in no other age to find its legitimate place in the world's activities and is seeking earnestly and prayerfully to adjust its mechanism and to apply its faith to the call of the millions who need the conscious revelation of a personal Savior in their lives.

We are hearing much about the stirrings of a more vigorous life among Methodists and Presbyterians and Congregationalists and sects of every kind. We find our conservative Protestant Episcopal brethren leading in a movement to create a world commission on faith and order, the fundamental purpose of which is the establishment of Christian unity. It is the age of brotherhoods and organized classes and united mission campaigns and forward movements and social service propagandas and religious congresses and efficiency secretaries, each and all voicing the mighty prayer of the Christian world for larger opportunities and greater power in the exercise of Christian discipleship.

The present day tendencies in the Church will probably increase the opportunities for the faddists and the religious freaks and there will likely be much striving to no purpose, but the important thing to remember is that apparently the Church is moving in the right direction, and mobility is at least a sign of life.

Amid these evidences of an outward reach, what of the Society of Friends? Are we keeping abreast of the average progress of the Christian Church? Are we profoundly conscious of a distinct message for this age? Denominationally do we have a pervading sense of an all consuming passion for a place of faithful ministration in meeting the needs of this generation? Have we a program adequate to our high professions of spiritual leading and experience? Amid the infidelities and the materialisms of this century do we collectively and as a whole feel a mighty pull to the service of exemplifying our faith and putting to the test our beliefs in the conscious revelation of God to man by the Holy Spirit? With our high conceptions of religious experience, with our professions of an intensive religious life under the direct guidance of the Spirit of truth, with our characteristic belief in the revelation that came to George Fox that Jesus Christ is ready to speak to the condition of every human soul, why should not Friends be in the vanguard of the forward march of the Church in these historic times?

Why, indeed, unless it be that in our conservatism we have not allowed our methods and our forms of procedure to keep pace with our professions and our necessities? Why, unless we have permitted our solidarity to be broken, and are content with the experiment of moving forward in somewhat isolated if not unsympathetic detachments? Why, unless we have lost somewhat the spirit of Christian democracy that characterized the life and work of the early Friends, and have retained too much of that unhealthy exclusiveness that took possession of the Church a century ago?

There is a restlessness within the Church that is apparent evidence of a striving for a more abundant life, a restlessness than can in no wise be ignored. It is time that the hand of the Church were laid in constructive solution upon our problems, lest there be uncontrollable upheavals that would threaten our existence as a body.

Our present concern relates to the unity of our organism and procedure. Without question the Five Years Meeting at Indianapolis in 1912 caught something of the same vision that is moving our brethren of the other Churches. All through the Society are

The pastor should be to his people what a factory superintendent is to his men. He should be a judge of human nature, should demand results, and see that everyone is busy. He should spend energy on the children, as time and energy thus used will not be in vain.

Following this was "What Type of Laymen is Expected by the Pastor," considered by Simon Hester. Pastors should expect their congregations to be men and women of God, perfect members of the church, people that can be depended upon. They should believe in God and the saving power of Jesus, as well as in the fundamental doctrines of the church. They should sit at the feet of Jesus, be loyal to the church, and take part in things of the community. They should be persons in whom the Spirit of God is; should provide for the boys and girls in the church.

Discussion was opened by Edward M. Woodard. These are subjects of great importance, but the solution is still greater. The pastor should be a man or woman of general ideas, ordinary sense, posted in a general way; should take pride in doing little things; know the work, and be a student of it. The average man or woman has a tender place in his or her heart. Men can be won to Christ as never before. Stand by the pastor when he is doing right and help him when he is doing wrong.

The evening session opened with devotional exercises conducted by Thomas C. Brown. A leaderless meeting followed in which the Holy Spirit led different ones to take part.

The address of the evening was given by Amos W. Butler, Secretary State Board of Charities, on the subject "Least of These." He said this work was started by Friends. He made a strong plea for the children and spoke from the following outline: Children as 1. Truants; 2. Dependents; 3. Neglected; 4. Defective, and 5. Delinquent. The family home is the place for the child. Unlikely children sometimes make most likely men. The only way we can serve God is by serving our fellow men.

On Wednesday morning, a prayer and praise service was conducted by J. B. Stipp. Next followed a Bible Lesson, I. Timothy, by Lydia Hoath. The everlasting gospel was able to open eyes. Prayer is another phase of church life. Wait on God and guard against our weaknesses.

"The Church Survey" was considered by William J. Cleaver. Survey from the chief corner-stone, which is Christ. Ye are the corporation of Christ. Rural foundation is the mother of city churches. Most of the meetings in Western Yearly Meeting are in rural towns. Atmosphere of the church is essential to life and development.

Discussion was led by Jehu Reagan. In our rural districts we find the absence of landlords and an increase of tenants. There should be interest and deep concern to get these interested in the church of the community.

Next was the "Building of the Church," by Charles R. Axton. It was a review of the work of Jefferson. It is the Christian association that keeps the preacher alive. Young men of today have as high ideals as ever they have had, a desire to do something worth while. The church of Christ stands in the world as a movement of God's Truth. The building of brotherhood is a company of men and women whose interests are bound and intertwined. The preacher cannot preach to a loveless congregation. A divided church can never win others.

Discussion was led by Gertrude M. Reineir. The Church is the mightiest force that there is. Brotherhood is not a social organization, but a spiritual creation. The conference closed with a deep feeling of appreciation to our Heavenly Father for His presence and blessing and the sweet fellowship of believers.

Correlating Our Denominational Life

Within recent years a new spirit has apparently taken possession of the Church, a spirit born of an enlarged vision of Christian responsibility. The awakening world has found its counterpart in the awakening Church. The dominant note of this twentieth century thus far has been that of the obligations of Christian brotherhood in terms both of community and world life. Home and foreign missions are essentially one and both together constitute the great world program of evangelism, which must ever be the supreme passion of the Church of Jesus Christ.

Upon every hand are the evidences that the leaven of Christian duty is working a change in religious forms and organisms suited to the needs of a changing civilization. Federalism and solidarity have succeeded individualism and disunity. In its corporate capacity the Church is apparently striving as in no other age to find its legitimate place in the world's activities and is seeking earnestly and prayerfully to adjust its mechanism and to apply its faith to the call of the millions who need the conscious revelation of a personal Savior in their lives.

We are hearing much about the stirrings of a more vigorous life among Methodists and Presbyterians and Congregationalists and sects of every kind. We find our conservative Protestant Episcopal brethren leading in a movement to create a world commission on faith and order, the fundamental purpose of which is the establishment of Christian unity. It is the age of brotherhoods and organized classes and united mission campaigns and forward movements and social service propagandas and religious congresses and efficiency secretaries, each and all voicing the mighty prayer of the Christian world for larger opportunities and greater power in the exercise of Christian discipleship.

The present day tendencies in the Church will probably increase the opportunities for the faddists and the religious freaks and there will likely be much striving to no purpose, but the important thing to remember is that apparently the Church is moving in the right direction, and mobility is at least a sign of life.

Amid these evidences of an outward reach, what of the Society of Friends? Are we keeping abreast of the average progress of the Christian Church? Are we profoundly conscious of a distinct message for this age? Denominationally do we have a pervading sense of an all consuming passion for a place of faithful ministrations in meeting the needs of this generation? Have we a program adequate to our high professions of spiritual leading and experience? Amid the infidelities and the materialisms of this century do we collectively and as a whole feel a mighty pull to the service of exemplifying our faith and putting to the test our beliefs in the conscious revelation of God to man by the Holy Spirit? With our high conceptions of religious experience, with our professions of an intensive religious life under the direct guidance of the Spirit of truth, with our characteristic belief in the revelation that came to George Fox that Jesus Christ is ready to speak to the condition of every human soul, why should not Friends be in the vanguard of the forward march of the Church in these historic times?

Why, indeed, unless it be that in our conservatism we have not allowed our methods and our forms of procedure to keep pace with our professions and our necessities? Why, unless we have permitted our solidarity to be broken, and are content with the experiment of moving forward in somewhat isolated if not unsympathetic detachments? Why, unless we have lost somewhat the spirit of Christian democracy that characterized the life and work of the early Friends, and have retained too much of that unhealthy exclusiveness that took possession of the Church a century ago?

There is a restlessness within the Church that is apparent evidence of a striving for a more abundant life, a restlessness than can in no wise be ignored. It is time that the hand of the Church were laid in constructive solution upon our problems, lest there be uncontrollable upheavals that would threaten our existence as a body.

Our present concern relates to the unity of our organism and procedure. Without question the Five Years Meeting at Indianapolis in 1912 caught something of the same vision that is moving our brethren of the other Churches. All through the Society are the evidences of life, and we do not minimize the progressive spirit of scores of our local meetings and thousands of our members. There are numerous evidences of a purpose to break through the shell of a somewhat exclusive environment into larger fields of service, and therein lies the hope both for the present and the future.

Yet we cannot avoid the conviction that our efforts lack system. Apparently they lack efficient correlation. Our work is yet too provincial. For the most part we are yet local Friends, or Quarterly Meeting Friends, or at most Yearly Meeting Friends, and thus far have failed, or refused, to go into the common melting pot that would establish our unity as Friends without distinguishing characterizations. We have yet to learn the lesson that if we go forward at all and if we are to leave the impress of our example and our endeavors in any lasting way upon the life of the world, we must do it all as one body. In rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem, Nehemiah directed that each family should build at the place of its assignment, but it was one wall that was being erected, "and all the wall was joined together."

No traveler in the treacherous Alps attempts to scale the heights alone, but with a rope around his waist he is linked inseparably with other travelers, and together they share their responsibilities, their dangers and their successes. The spirit of antagonism to the Five Years Meeting bodes no good for the Friends Church in America. "United we stand, divided we fall." Together we must solve our problems and we must face our dangers. In unity we will go forward or we must inevitably go backward.

The call of the world is in our ears and in our hearts. It is the cry of humanity for light and for guidance. No local meeting, no Yearly Meeting can solve our problems alone. By taking counsel together and by rallying around our Central Boards, shall we not put forth a supreme effort to incorporate our Quaker ideals into the life of this century as an important element in the Christianizing influences of this age? Our Yearly Meetings can do no better work this year than to correlate themselves both in letter and in spirit to the mechanism and purposes of the Five Years Meeting.

The Gentleness of Christ

BY M. RHODES

Paul was not angered, but he was grieved at the reproaches cast upon his ministry by those whom he had served so faithfully. The spirit in which he appeals to the Corinthians is the revelation of a great soul. His indeed was the mind of Christ. It is a degree of perfection possible to all through grace. Just in proportion as this spirit is developed in the Church and in the world are we moving toward the realization of the new heavens and the new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness.

Paul's motive is the gentleness of Christ. There are no words of man adequate to describe fully what is meant by the gentleness of Christ. We must, however, venture to approach it. All these great soul elements appear in their sublime completeness in him. He brought them to us, and by the spirit of grace we must seek to acquire them. In their possession we become like him. Gentleness is love expressing itself in kindly quietness to others who may be excited by error or mistake. Some one says: "It is the carpet soft and deep, which whilst it diffuses ample comfort, deadens many a creaking sound. It is the pillow on which sickness lays its head and forgets half its misery. It is promptitude of sympathy." It is the wisdom of approach, quiet, winsome, like the peace of God. The atmosphere makes no noise, yet its force is always great. It approaches like morning dew shed on awakening flowers. How gentle is God to human weakness, and how he does strive to "make up with his own hands what is wanting in human faculty!"

Strong men seldom care for the weak; the blind are put on one side, the incapable are dismissed with impatience; but here is "God, the Lord, the Creator of the ends of the earth, taking the blind man's hand and leading him like a child especially beloved." Thus we struggle to give some expression of what is meant by the gentleness of Christ.

Maybe we shall do better by some practical application of it. Controversy in the church, both local and general, has sometimes been necessary; but alas how often it has been mixed with asperity and has resulted in the gratification of malign feelings rather than in the promotion of a righteous cause. It requires gentleness to preserve the unity of the Spirit in the bonds of peace, to correct error and mistake. A personal word or approach may have a good purpose, but if made in a brusque manner may wholly defeat the best object in view. Paul had quite enough to vex as well as grieve him among the Corinthians, but he comes to them in the gentleness of Christ. How when he was gone they must surely have felt and spoken about it. He defended himself and the truth, but the mightiest force in his defense was the spirit in which he did it.

The gentleness of Christ is the death of selfishness. Selfishness lies at the bottom of all haste, abruptness, unkindness, and passion for victory rather than for righteousness. It may be some imagine that this beautiful and effective grace is not for them. They were not born so, surely not. The gentleness of Christ is his own gift. It is the triumph of the Spirit as well as his fruit. Saul was a storm-cloud. Paul was in the third heaven and comes to entreat men by the gentleness of Christ, himself the illustration of this semblance to his Lord.

How queenly it is in the home. And what a sanctuary the home is for such an adornment. It becomes it as light and joy become heaven. Harshness, asperity, any malign feeling, is as unbecoming in the home as irreverence and profanity would be in the house of God. No doubt much domestic infelicity comes from ungarded tongues and tempers. The love of Christ and the indwelling gentle Spirit of God furnish the only remedy. The appeal to quiet and forbearance should be marked and welcomed at every hearthstone. The gentleness of Christ in mother and father, husband and wife, should be as welcome and as quiet and beautiful as the sunlight in the morning. Gentleness, as elsewhere, has its specific mission in the home. There is no completeness without it. "It is that quiet influence which, like the scented flame of an alabaster lamp, fills many a home with light and warmth and fragrance." When the gentleness of Christ dominates in the church and in the homes of the world we shall be justified in speaking of the nearness of the millennium. We know that the strong word must now and again be spoken, but it will be a strong word only in proportion as it is spoken in the gentleness of Christ.

A home should be so ordered—some are, we are sure—that the memory of it, when the hearthstone is deserted, should prove as an attending angel with a hallowed song on his lips. Grace is sufficient here as elsewhere. Let us strive to make our homes, our lives everywhere a noticed expression of the gentleness of Christ. Let the word of the Spirit be the last. "Now I, Paul, entreat you by the meekness and gentleness of Christ."—Lutheran Observer.

A Bunch of Keys

BY CHAS. M. WOODMAN

The bunch of keys which I carry in my pocket is an indispensable piece of personal furniture. Without it I may be shut out of my own home, and separated from things of great value. With it doors that are locked open at my will, and places otherwise isolated are within my reach. Every personality carries a bunch of keys with which certain rooms of life are open. Without it life is narrow, cramped and shut into a corridor. With it life is broad, rich, full and varied.

There is the key of mental power, with which all the treasures of knowledge and wisdom may be reached. The trained mind is the "open sesame," at whose touch the hidden treasures of knowledge yield up their stores. Mental power is one of humanity's great assets. With it a prison cell with a book in it becomes a palace beautiful; or without the book it becomes the birthplace of a Pilgrim's Progress, or Epistles to the Ephesians or the Colossians.

There is the key of the will which as a social force opens the door into the room of leadership, power among men. The will harnesses the forces of influence which radiate in every direction from a life, and, driving them into a given channel, exert a perceptible pressure upon the home, the church, the community, the state. It was an inflexible will which led the Christ with unswerving purpose from the Throne of God to the Cross of Calvary; but it was thus that the cross became a fulcrum over which the living Christ today is prying the world into the very presence of God.

There is the key of the heart which opens the door into the room of feeling, where tenderness, sweetness, beauty and love permeate the atmosphere like sweet perfume from many flowers. Some people pride themselves on keeping this room of the life locked with the shutters always closed. They are afraid of being accused of wearing their heart on their sleeve, when in reality most people who know them wonder if they have any heart at all. They are like houses without furnaces, or hot-houses without heating plants. There are other people who live in this room all the time. Nothing is of value to them which isn't steeped in emotion. The key of the mind and the will are rusty with lack of use. Their experience is of the hot-house type of growth. It flourishes under glass in the heat, but develops no stamina to stand the chill winds of a cold world. This key of the heart is as indispensable to the true life as a heating plant is to a school house. We do not, however, expect the pupils to live and work in the boiler room. The heat from this room must be carried to every other portion of the personality. Mind is frosty without emotion; will power without feeling is often cruel and heartless.

A fourth essential key on the ring of personality is the key of faith. It opens the door to God, and lets the light of the eternal into the dark rooms of material and the temporal. It is the latch-key which lets us, not into, but out of the house of the purely human into the really divine, from the limitations of the finite to the illimitable out-of-doors of the great life of the Infinite. It is the key of the cell in the hands of the prisoner by which he becomes free from the imprisonment of circumstances and environment. Where the mind reaches its limit, where the will is futile to act, and where the heart fails in its efforts at attainment, there the key of faith opens the hitherto unseen door which leads to the fullness of life. In other words, faith is the skeleton key which fits doors that were seemingly made for other keys. "Without faith it is impossible to please God," and without faith men have discovered again and again by experience, that many a gate is barred and many a room is locked which no other key on the ring of personality can open.

Conquering the Desert

BY CHARLES E. TEBBETTS

In my recent trip west I passed through what was formerly called the Great American Desert this side of the Rocky Mountains, and also the desert stretches beyond. It was a revelation to see in the region which a few years ago was thought a worthless waste, prosperous communities, throughout the far southwest of Kansas and extreme west of Oklahoma. Every six to ten miles along this railroad were prosperous towns, with brick blocks and good concrete sidewalks, electric lights and every evidence of modern improvements. The extended fields of grain were green with promise of abundant harvest. Large herds of cattle grazing on good pasturage were in excellent condition.

Methods of "dry-farming" are bringing fair returns from a rich soil with sometimes scant rainfall. Broom corn, kaffir corn, cane and other cereals do well where ordinary corn frequently fails. In sections alfalfa, most valuable of all foreign crops, does well. Farm houses and out-buildings were well built and well kept up. One misses trees and orchards.

Through this region are three large Quarterly Meetings—Haviland and Fowler, in western Kansas, and Gate, in western Oklahoma. These meetings are strong and liberal in their support of mission work, setting an example to older communities with more settled conditions. God's pledge of prosperity in outward things to those who are faithful to minister of the prosperity He gives, for the advancement of His Kingdom, seems largely realized by the good Friends in this pioneer section.

In southern Arizona I stopped over a day with a new settlement of Friends, ten miles south of Maricopa. In a level valley, surrounded by mountains, a group of pioneers are endeavoring to rescue a waste desert to become a fruitful land. Some spots, when water is available, show the soil to be exceedingly rich and productive. Wells show, they think, an abundant supply of good water 100 feet below the surface. It is a question of bringing this water to the surface in sufficient quantity for irrigation.

A May day picnic gave opportunity to meet two score or more of these courageous pioneers, who look forward with faith and hope to conquering this desert. Almost within sight, some thirty or forty miles to the north, is the prosperous Salt River Valley which has been reclaimed by the government work of water storage by the Roosevelt dam.

Six hours' ride brought us to the Imperial Valley in the extreme south of California, on the Mexican line. A branch railroad of forty-one miles from Imperial Junction on one side to Calexico on the other traverses this valley, which is perhaps as broad as it is long. The entire valley is below sea level and in the not distant past was a great inland sea. A break in the banks of the Colorado River a few years ago threatened to restore this sea; in fact, the Salton Sea or Imperial Lake as it is now called bears witness to partial success. This wonderful valley has been reclaimed since my first trip to California twenty-five years ago.

From a Los Angeles paper I take the following figures of this year's products: 80,000 acres of cotton yielding 75,000 bales; 85,000 head of beef cattle; 9,000 acres of cantaloupes which will send out 5,000 car loads this season. At the busy season it will take 100 cars a day to take them out; 100,000 acres of barley are now ripe for harvest; 125,000 acres of alfalfa that will give at least five cuttings. This is largely fed out on the land and results in 6,000,000 pounds of butter. Value of all produce last year, $15,000,000.

I attended the Friends Meeting five miles out from Holtville. The house was crowded, and nearly all came in automobiles. This meeting is pledging about half the support of the Hoyts in Africa, who went out from this valley. These instances show that what was formerly regarded as waste, worthless land, may be the richest soil in the world. It only needs water, and courageous human effort to transform it into the richest garden spots. It is the literal fulfillment of the old prophecy that the desert or wilderness shall blossom as the rose.

We are also discovering in these days the human counterpart to this. There have been desert races of men that more advanced races have regarded as worthless, without possibilities of advanced power and culture, but we know that these races, many of them at least, are just as capable of high attainments as our own. The Water of Life reaches them and immediately they respond with results that take us by surprise. Cannibal races in the Pacific Islands and the interior of Africa under the power of this Water of Life in a generation put us to shame by their faithfulness. The Fiji Islanders, that eighty years ago were the lowest savages, now rank nearly at the top in the Sunday School annual reports of the world.

The richest harvests of the Gospel are not now in our older Christian lands, but on this fresh soil of what we used to call heathenism. These harvests are found in all races from the primitive races of Africa to the old civilizations of India, Japan and China. The entire Moslem world shows signs of a great awakening. Let the Church realize that the largest results of Gospel work are to be found in these apparently desert soils and let her send out the irrigating streams of the Water of Life, and another generation, perhaps even our own, will see rich spiritual harvests, and awakened nations, with quickened powers for a higher life, that may bring to actual realization "the new world where dwelleth righteousness."

New Industrial School at C. Victoria, Mexico

BY GEORGE C. LEVERING

I have watched with great interest the move which the Mission Board has recently taken for a decided advance in the work in Mexico. In the first place, very substantial economies and at the same time increased efficiency will be sure to result from the closer co-operation of the Boards in their publishing and educational work. When we were in Mexico five years ago, the various Denominational Boards were maintaining five or six separate publishing plants, each one publishing at considerable expense its own church paper. The combination of these into one plant with one paper to speak for the entire Protestant church in Mexico is in itself a great step forward. In the educational work also the increased economy and efficiency will be hardly less notable.

But the step which has attracted my attention even more than the above and about which I especially want to speak at present, is the forward step which is being taken in our own work at C. Victoria.

When Mrs. Levering and I went to Mexico twelve years ago, we went with the special purpose of establishing a boys' school at C. Victoria. After we had spent a few months in the study of the language, Juarez (Whä'ras) Institute was started with twelve boys as pupils. The building which served us as a home and school-house in one, was a six-room dwelling house on a city lot about 100 x 150 feet in size. During the past twelve years the school has grown from twelve to more than one hundred pupils, the capacity of the house has been nearly doubled, the charge for board and tuition has been more than doubled and last year, in spite of cramped and overcrowded quarters, half as many boys were turned away as were admitted. In other words, the school is now firmly established as the best school for boys in all that section of Mexico, and Professor R. Solomon Tice now in charge of the work, has gained the entire confidence of the best people of that whole section. And now the Board has taken a very important step in advance.

Ninety acres of land, well situated, a little more than one mile from the old lot in town, has been purchased, together with enough water for the irrigation of some seventy-five acres. This land has been fenced, cleared of stones and otherwise improved. And now the Board has decided to build a twelve thousand dollar home and dormitory building on this land, just as soon as the money can be raised and political conditions in Mexico will permit. This is the most important step which our Board has taken in our Mexican work for several years.

In the first place, C. Victoria is the capital of one of the richest agricultural states of Mexico. Other states are rich in mines and in manufacturing, but the wealth of Tamaulipas is in her farms. Yet this wealth is largely undeveloped. The old wooden plow is still the one and only implement on most of the farms and the state has no agricultural school whatever. The door of opportunity is flung wide open and the call of a great need bids us enter in. This move will enable us to help poor but ambitious boys to help themselves to an education and to an independent and influential, because useful, place in Mexican society. It will enable us to raise much of the food required by our two growing boarding schools at C. Victoria, thus effecting an important economy in their maintainances.

Our boys come almost entirely from the farm. Their parents, many of them, own the land which should be a source of greatly increased wealth to the entire state, yet it is the ambition of most of these boys to become lawyers, doctors, teachers, merchants,—anything but farmers. This move will help to stem this tide away from the farm and will send our boys back to their homes to be centres of progress and influence right where they are needed and where they can become independent. In Mexico, the owner of a ranch is the dominant power over the lives of all his people. His home is the center of a village or town as the case may be, composed of anywhere from three or four to a hundred or more families. Many of our boys are the sons of these ranch owners, who if they learn improved agriculture at our school, will return home to become the natural governors of these villages and towns, and so the real molders of public opinion among the Mexican people.

In our schools in Mexico the Bible is recognized as the foundation of all true character, the corner-stone of civilization and of progress. And what will it mean for the future of Mexico to have the Bible and practical education in agriculture thus linked together and joined up with the best literary education to be had in all that section? God alone can measure the power for good of such a combination.

And now is the time to act. Whatever the outcome of the present struggle, the next ten years can hardly fail to be a time of greatly increased opportunity for mission work in Mexico. The better people see their need of better foundations for their national life. They will be reaching hands for help after the unsettled conditions of the present are over. We should be in a position to lead the way and to give them the help which they so sorely need.

In talking recently with R. S. Tice, I have been impressed with the clearness of his vision and with the firm healthy character of his faith. He believes in God and in the Mexican people. Like Lincoln in the hour of our own nation's greatest peril, he sees that "While the Mexican people are wobbling a good deal, and will still wobble some, yet in the end they will wobble right." Mr. Tice is acting as the agent of the Board to secure the subscription of the fund of $12,000.00 with which to build a home and dormitory for the accommodation of fifty boys. Certainly it ought not to be difficult for him to secure the subscription of this amount for such an object.

Young People's Secretary

[We recently asked Thomas E. Jones, Secretary of the Board of Young People's Activities to prepare a statement of plans for publication in THE AMERICAN FRIEND. The following response is interesting and self-explanatory.—EDITOR.]

HOSMER HALL, HARTFORD, CONN.,

May 5, 1914.

S. Edgar Nicholson, Richmond, Ind.:

Dear Friend—I find it both impossible and rather inadvisable to outline my plans for work among young Friends. I should rather do something I had not outlined than to say I was going to do a thing and then fail. As time goes on, however, I shall send in from time to time certain things that we are doing as well as challenges to the whole Society to do certain things.

My present scheme is one of conservation and efficiency. I hope to visit every Yearly Meeting as soon as possible, studying their problems and methods of working them out. I do not pose as a bishop, but as a helper. As a worker discovers a scheme that has worked to good advantage in his community, I hope he will write me full particulars at once. These things will all be placed on file with the author's name attached. I hope to get the name and address of every young Friend in America as well as pictures of groups and the history of their organization. I am deeply interested in Christian Endeavor, Foreign and Home Mission work and shall do all I can to interest Friends in the place our Society holds among modern church movements.

As I previously stated, these things are merely hopes and must be considered as such. There is much more satisfaction in telling what has already been done.

The Quaker Club at Hartford is more alive than it ever has been. We have held meetings every fortnight and have invited Friends to meet with us. In this way we have come in touch with a great many prominent Friends of the East.

The Friends of Wellesley and Boston are wide awake and have held some excellent public meetings.

The young Friends of Fall River have taken new courage and are planning a conference this summer.

The Quakers in Mt. Holyoke College have recently been organized into a Quaker Club and hold meetings once each week. Friends in the Connecticut Valley met at Springfield for an excellent conference and meeting. A most encouraging tramp was held at Worcester, Mass. Young Friends attended this meeting, coming from Boston, Lynn, Winthrop Center, Maine, Hartford, Conn., and Northampton, Mass.

Next Saturday and Sunday, Friends will hold a meeting in the First and Second Congregational Churches of Northampton, Mass. Names are being gathered, church and college papers and magazines collected and church statistics compiled.

The Young Friends Secretary asks all to co-operate with him in collecting information about the present status of the Society; the outlook in every section; and suggestions regarding methods that have been beneficial.

I hope this covers some of the things you asked for.

Yours sincerely,

T. E. JONES.

Getting Visions of Opportunity

Some weeks ago we gave extended space in these columns to the great convocation of Methodist men at Indianapolis, and the wonderful visions of opportunity which came to the assembled thousands. On May 5-7, a congress of men of the United Brethren Church met at Dayton, Ohio, which is described as superior to any gathering ever held before by that body of believers. Among the speakers were Robert E. Speer, of the Presbyterian Foreign Mission Board; J. E. McAfee, of the Presbyterian Home Mission Board; Charles S. Macfarland, Secretary of the Federal Council; Dr. C. G. Trumbull, of the Sunday School Times, and leading men of the United Brethren Church.

The following policy was adopted, which shows that these men too caught some large visions of opportunity.

1. We recognize the great responsibility of our denomination for carrying the bread of life to hungry millions at home and abroad, and we this day consecrate ourselves anew to the unfinished tasks of the denomination.

2. We commit ourselves to the basic principles of Christian stewardship as expressed in the Word of God as the divine plan of procedure, and that we prosecute a church-wide campaign for the training of our people in these principles.

3. We believe that the supreme need of our Church is a trained leadership, both ministerial and lay, who shall be able to develop the latent resources of our people in their relations as stewards and co-workers with Christ.

4. As an aid to securing such leadership, we recommend that our annual conference sessions be made powerful institute periods in which our people shall receive the vision and training necessary to meet the present needs. We also approve the holding of summer conferences with a view to the developing of an expert leadership.

5. We recognize the importance of bringing the vision, purpose, and plans of this congress to our educational institutions that the future leadership of the Church may be in training for the greater achievements just ahead, and we assure these institutions of our sympathetic, hearty co-operation in making them a powerful agency in the extension of the kingdom.

6. We view with alarm the fact that so many of our local churches are ceasing to be virile agencies in the winning of men to Christ, and we call the entire Church to prayer for the awakening and quickening of the evangelistic passion which shall express itself both through personal evangelism and through the Sunday School.

We recommend to our local churches a net annual increase of ten per cent. in our membership as a minimum achievement and we fix twenty-five per cent. net increase as a more fitting expression of our responsibility in winning men to Christ.

7. We heartily endorse the system of church finance as enacted by the last General Conference, which has for its basic principle the every-member canvass for a weekly subscription for both the local church and the benevolence boards; we urge that the minimum asking of the commission of finance be raised in full, and that a working goal of $500,000 annually be fixed, and that the ultimate goal be, "As much for others as for ourselves." In order to accomplish our task and reach our portion of the race for Christ, it is necessary that our men of money make large and liberal gifts for the endowment of our educational institutions and the promotion and equipment of our work at home and abroad.

8. We believe that an educational campaign must be planned which will carry this message of advance into every local church in the denomination, and we recommend to the favorable consideration of our pastors, conference superintendents, and conference commissions that they plan to enlist our people in a most thorough study of our various denominational enterprises and to bear the spirit and content of this congress to all the local congregations.

9. We believe in the application of the principles and teachings of Christ to all social and economic questions.

"A good deed is never lost. He who sows courtesy reaps friendship, and he who plants kindness gathers love."

Financing the Work of the Church

VI. THE PLEDGE AND THE ENVELOPE

To Pledge or Not to Pledge. That is the pivotal question upon which the financial policy of the Church must turn. Church obligations, for the most part, are necessarily incurred at or before the beginning of the fiscal year. The support of missionaries and pastors, appropriations for the work of Boards and Standing Committees and other stated expenses must be guaranteed in advance. If the work is to be carried on with any worthy degree of efficiency the congregation, the Monthly Meeting, the Yearly Meeting, the Church in some one or other of its collective capacities must stand pledged to finance it in definite amounts as it proceeds. It is difficult to see how this can be squared to the principles of sound business integrity except as the necessary funds are guaranteed in advance by definite pledges on the part of the individual members who constitute the Church. Now and then a meeting may be found in which there is a tacit understanding that a large proportion of the members are excused from contributing money on the ground of their limited circumstances and that a small circle of more or less wealthy Friends stands responsible for the bulk of the financial burdens from year to year. Whether such exemption of the poorer members is consistent with their spiritual welfare and the highest vitality of the congregation to which they belong is an open question. But instances of that kind are comparatively rare and do not effect the general proposition that the financial obligations of the meeting collectively should rest upon the individual pledges of the members who compose it. These pledges should make reasonable allowance for contingencies in the financial circumstances of those who make them. They should be subject to modification or withdrawal upon notice of inability to meet them at any time during the year for which they are made. Experience has shown that, when the several steps of a good financial plan are faithfully carried out by a meeting, the deficit at the end of the year from diminished or cancelled pledges will rarely be found to be a formidable one.

Experience also points to the conclusion that regular weekly installments through the envelope collection is the most satisfactory plan for the payment of pledges. A few givers may prefer to make their offerings monthly or quarterly, for which provision can be made. Among the many cogent arguments in favor of the weekly basis a single one may be mentioned here, namely, Regular giving belongs to regular worship. This was true under the Mosaic Law. Jehovah's word to His people was, "None shall appear before me empty." It is equally true under the Gospel. Jesus still sits over against the treasury mindful of the gifts of the worshipers and appraising their real amount by the measure of sacrifice on the part of the givers which they represent. The weekly money offering can be made genuinely religious. If made devoutly it will have a wholesome spiritual reaction upon those who make it. Again, let Paul make the program for the benevolences of individual Christians. "Upon the first day of the week [systematically] let every one of you [individually] lay by him in store as God hath prospered him [proportionately]." The question was summed up by the Laymen's Missionary Movement in the following words: "The weekly system of offerings is the most Scriptural, fair, business-like and productive method of giving, and when properly introduced and worked, it secures the largest possible educational, financial and spiritual results."

JOSEPH JOHN MILLS,

Pasadena, California.

The Haverford Summer School

The plans for the Summer School to be held at Haverford College, June 20-29 next, are now almost perfected, and give promise of one of the most attractive Friends' Conferences ever held in this country. A number of well known speakers, both Friends and others, have consented to take part in the program, and to judge by the advance applications for rooms, the gathering will be unusually large and representative. As several times before, Haverford College has generously turned over its halls and beautiful campus to the accommodation of the guests, where board and lodging can be secured at a reasonable rate.

The full announcement shortly to be published, will show a daily arrangement of two lectures each morning (except First-day), beside a short meeting for worship and an hour for study classes. The afternoons are practically free. In the evenings an address will be given by a prominent speaker. Among the speakers are included President W. Douglas Mackenzie, of Hartford; Professor Hugh Black, of New York; Walter Rauschenbusch, author of widely read books on Christianity and the social order; Arthur Holmes and J. P. Lichtenberger, professors in Pennsylvania State College and in the University of Pennsylvania, respectively. These speakers will deal in a broad way with some of the present-day religious questions or with permanent spiritual needs.

A number of the more prominent Quaker scholars will be on hand. The Bible Class will be taught successively by three of them: Elihu Grant, of Smith College; Augustus T. Murray, of California; and George A. Barton, of Bryn Mawr. Eleanor D. Wood, of Wellesley, will speak on some Biblical subject. Rufus M. Jones, of Haverford, will give a series of lectures on the History of Quietism in Europe and its effect on Quakerism.

A new and valuable feature of this year's School will be a class on the method of teaching a Bible Class by Professor Hugh Hartshorne, of New York.

The opportunities for inspiration and instruction at such a school are hard to describe. They can best be known by experience. A cordial invitation is extended to all. This conference is not only for one local group of Friends, nor indeed for Friends exclusively, though a few features of the program, especially the week-end conference (Sixth month 27-28) on a "Forward Movement in Quakerism" will interest Friends especially.

Those desiring to secure lodging and board at the college are advised to apply for reservations as early as possible to Henry J. Cadbury, Haverford, Pennsylvania, to whom all inquiries should be addressed. Attendance at the meetings and lectures of the school is free to all.

Women's Foreign Missionary Union

The ninth triennial meeting of the Women's Foreign Missionary Union was held at Muncie, Indiana, May 7 to 12. It was a gathering full of inspiration and was attended by delegates from most of Yearly Meetings.

The following Friends' missionaries were in attendance: R. Esther Smith, Raymond S. Holding, Dr. Isabel DeVol, Anna Farr, Jefferson and Helen Farr Ford, Solomon Tice and wife, Sarah Lindley, and the two Mexican girls now in Earlham College.

Susan G. Shipley and Mary Wildman were present as fraternal delegates from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, while George H. Moore and Charles Carey were named as fraternal delegates from the American Friends' Board.

Eliza Armstrong Cox read a most valuable paper on the plans and work of the Union, which was directed to be printed in the Advocate. We are sorry not to have a detailed report of the conference for presentation this week. By a unanimous vote, the proposed conference of the men of the church was approved.

The following resolution was adopted by the conference:

That the W. F. M. U., at its yearly meetings and through its presidents, recommend the stimulus and inspiration of the conference for organizing auxiliaries where none exist; that the presidents carry out the continuation idea of the doings of the conference at all meetings by summarizing the methods and ideas advanced; that the societies be careful to maintain the principles advanced under the heading of systematic giving; that prayer be made a principle to be followed out at every meeting; that study of facts be urged in connection with missionary work; that the president and officers of the W. F. M. U. be commended for their devotion and services; that the conference express its appreciation of the editor of the Advocate; that loyal support be given to its staff; that Miss Angie Taylor be thanked for her Bible lessons; that thanks be given the Muncie Friends for opening their homes and hearts to the delegates, and that the Commercial Club of this city and all who helped to make the delegates welcome, be given appreciation and thanks.

Charlotte E. Vickers of Chicago was re-elected to the office of president by the unanimous vote of the assembly. Other officers elected were: First vice-president, Martha E. Newlin, Pasadena, Cal.; second vice-president, Mary A. Crossman, Maine; recording secretary, Harriett W. Purdié, Wilmington, Ohio; corresponding secretary, Sarah J. King, Noblesville, Ind.; treasurer, Emma G. Randolph, Massachusetts.

The general secretaries of departments elected were: Interest in organization, Charlotte E. Vickers; literature, Martha D. Henley, Indianapolis; young people's work, Edith Thornburg, Wilmington, Ohio; proportional and systematic giving, Sarah E. Weeks.

The staff chosen for the Friends Missionary Advocate were: Eliza Armstrong Cox, Columbus, Ind., editor in chief; Olive R. Lindley, Richmond, Ind., assistant editor; Ethel Kirk Calvert, Highland, Ohio, treasurer; A. Viola Horisberg, Baltimore, Md., business manager.

Why Not a Fathers' Day?

In these busy morning hours I have been impressed with the blessing a fathers' day might be to us. As our ministers used to say, "The concern grows on me and I leave it with you." We have our mothers' day and our children's day, why not a fathers' day? I would not wish to take away anything from either of these established days, for I believe them most impressive and helpful.

I am sure our recent mothers' day services were a blessing in our own meeting. It keeps us as mothers and children closer together, helps us to remember our obligations and hold sacred the memory of "those we loved and lost awhile." In one meeting on this day the minister told of his own experience of being led to Christ by his mother, where "They knelt in his room together

When he was but a child,
The Savior heard and answered,
The Father looked down and smiled."

He urged mothers to lead their children to the Savior and not leave it to the ministers, the Church, or others. It is a privilege, and I believe a duty, we owe our children.

In another meeting the pastor's wife read:

"Backward, turn backward, oh Time, in thy flight, Make me a child again, just for tonight."

It was most impressive, and many eyes were dim with tears as memories crowded in upon the hearers.

Yes, the mothers' day and the children's day are blessings to our churches and communities, but do we not too much lose sight of the father's help, responsibility and love? Cannot the father's day also be made a great blessing? "Like as a father pitieth his children." Do we enough keep in remembrance this part of fatherhood? In my own life my father's love and life meant much to me. It seemed he knew just how to help me. He so often encouraged me to study and commit to memory God's word, telling me I would need it. I have so often found it helpful in time of temptation and burden that seemed too great, then these promises I learned when only a child came to me. My own father left his family of seven children in the month of July.

With a mothers' day in May; a children's day in June; can't we have a profitable fathers' day in July, binding us as families, churches and communities closer together in this busy twentieth century?

A MOTHER.

Current Items of Interest to Friends

CALIFORNIA YEARLY MEETING

The Beginners' Department of the Pasadena Bible School has recently so greatly increased in numbers under the devoted management of two young Friends, Holly Luther and Marjorie Baker, that it became necessary to provide better accommodations. One day a subscription of $250.00 was taken in the Bible School, the money to be used in purchasing lumber. With donations of the various kinds of labor required, a new building was soon completed. With appropriate exercises it was dedicated to its intended use, and the Beginners now meet in a neat, attractive bungalow on the lot adjoining the meeting-house.

Forty-five members of Pasadena Meeting attended the session of Pasadena Quarterly Meeting held in Los Angeles, April 25th. The other Monthly Meetings were also well represented. Wilson H. and Lucy Cox bade farewell to the meeting, as they expect to return to Alaska early in the summer, before California Yearly Meeting. Rhoda M. Hare, and James V. and Eva Watson Geary, former missionaries in Alaska, were also present. R. Esther Smith and Mae E. Burke, on furlough from Central America, called the attention of Friends to Christian work in the tropics. It was announced that I. H. and Dorothy Cammack, of Chiquemula, Guatemala, have been commissioned to open Friends' work in the capital of Honduras, a hitherto unoccupied field.

The pledges for Church and Missionary Funds secured as a result of the every-member canvass of Pasadena Friends show practically no increase over the pledges of the previous year. Since the canvass a number of members whose attachment to the church was but slight, have requested to be released, or transferred to other denominations.

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING

Van Wert, Ohio.—Mothers' Day was very appropriately observed by Van Wert Meeting on May 10th. An excellent program was rendered, consisting of special music by the choir and four ladies taking part in select readings. Instead of the usual custom of giving carnations, a white ribbon badge was pinned on each person whose mother had passed away, and a pink ribbon on everyone whose mother is living. One of the interesting incidents and most beautiful sights in connection with this service was when the school opened, to see the young men's class, taught by Mrs. Tormohlen, all take their places with their mothers in the class. This class now has an enrollment of thirty. On Wednesday evening, the 13th, the class arranged for a banquet. Twenty of the boys were present and had an enjoyable as well as profitable time. Mr. I. E. Antrim gave the address for the evening. Mr. Antrim is a member of the M. E. Church of this city and is a fine Christian gentleman. His talk to the boys was greatly appreciated. The Bible School is constantly on the increase, having increased in the past six months from about 160 to an average of about 230 at present.

Rockford, Ohio.—Van Wert Quarterly Meeting of Friends was held at Rockford, Ohio, May 1, 2 and 3. The meeting for ministry and oversight was held Friday afternoon at 2:00 o'clock with much interest. Perry Bantz, pastor of the circuit churches in Van Wert, Ohio, was the principal speaker. Friday evening was an open meeting of the Efficiency Committee. A number of subjects were discussed as follows:

The Financial Problem of the Church
—Fred H. Tormohlen

Discussion—A. D. Behymer
The Responsibility of the Church Member—Albert Runion
Discussion—Elmer E. Hale
Teachers' Training Course—Frank Fisher

Discussion—Homer Phillips

On Saturday, inspiring messages were given by Homer Phillips, of St. Marys, and Clifford Pearson, of Monroe, Indiana. On Saturday evening and Sabbath morning, Clifford Pearson gave some interesting messages. On Sabbath evening a temperance address was given by Fred H. Tormohlen.

IOWA YEARLY MEETING

Marshalltown.—The inner life of the membership of the church at Marshalltown, Iowa, has been greatly refreshed and enlarged through the ministry of the McCargar evangelists, of Oskaloosa, Iowa, the one a preacher, the other a singer. Meetings began April 12th, ending May 7th. Their labors were supplemented by the progress and words of encouragement of our pastor, I. N. Rich. At nearly every altar call a greater or less number responded, either for conversion, restoration or sanctification. We are glad to say they preach and sing the two consecutive steps in the work of grace, justification, sanctification and the second coming of Christ. A children's meeting was held which proved to be a great blessing for little folks. It was touching to see little children, boys and girls, kneel at the altar and in tears and prayers give themselves to Christ. We thank God for the gift of these two young men to the Church.

Des Moines.—M. Emma Newby, Treasurer and Secretary of the Woman's Home Missionary Society of Iowa Yearly Meeting, attended the triennial meeting at Muncie, Indiana. Elizabeth Keates was sent as a delegate by the local W. F. M. S. of the Des Moines Meeting.

Mothers' Day was observed with appropriate exercises by the Friends of Des Moines, both in the meeting and in the Sabbath School. The Sabbath School has been changed from 12 to 10 o'clock. Friends are taking an active part in the Billy Sunday campaign. He is going to conduct a tabernacle campaign in Des Moines during the fall months.

KANSAS YEARLY MEETING

Haviland.—Haviland Quarterly Meeting occurred at Hopewell, Kansas, May 8, 9 and 10. The different sessions were well attended and much interest was manifested in the work of the Church. The clerk was directed to send a letter of sympathy to the President and Secretary of State in this trying hour as the war cloud hangs over our country. Also a request to our Congressmen and Representatives at Washington that they support the Hughes-Smith bill in reference to censorship in moving picture shows.

A quadrangular meet occurred at Haviland, Kansas, May 1, 1914, in oratory, music, reading and athletics, between the four Friends' Academies of southwestern Kansas, namely, Haviland, Stella, Fowler and Laurance. The competition was sharp and each school had cause to be proud of its representatives. Haviland Academy carried off the laurels in all four points.

Oak Dale, Oklahoma.—On the evening of April 26th, John S. Jones and wife, of Coyle, Oklahoma, closed a successful revival at Oak Dale Meeting, near Agra, Oklahoma. Thirty persons were definitely blessed either by renewal, conversion of the baptism with the Holy Spirit. These Friends preached the old-time gospel in all its fullness, and the power of God was felt in every meeting. Twenty persons united with Friends.

WESTERN YEARLY MEETING

Mooreville.—White Lick Quarterly Meeting, which was held at Mooreville the 9th instant, had the pleasure of hearing an inspiring sermon by Edward M. Woodard at the morning hour on First-day, and a splendid address by Leannah Hobson on her recent trip to England, at the evening hour. Both speakers were greeted by a large audience.

Bloomingtondale.—Bloomingtondale Academy won first in both oratory and declamation in the Inter-Academic contest held at Vermilion Grove, May 2, Parke Pender winning in oratory and Miss Audrey Church in declamation.

Earlham Day was observed at Bloomingtondale, Indiana, on the evening of May 10. The general theme of the program was the influence of Earlham College on our community. The first talk was given by Alma Coleman Brown, who reviewed the list of Earlhamites in this place. "Student Life" was discussed by H. Paul Kelsey. Enos Harvey spoke on "The Christian Influence of the College." Reminiscent talks were given by Maude Woody, Nathan Pickett, Dr. R. F. Hester and other old students.

Danville.—A two-weeks' meeting conducted by Lindley A. Wells, of Oregon, closed at this place on April 12. The preaching was plain and practical throughout and resulted in the deepening of the spiritual life of the Church. The doctrine of the baptism of the Spirit was preached with unction and great blessing, and many were convinced of the need of higher steps in the Christian life. Our meetings proved a blessing to all the churches in Danville, and closed with large crowds and a splendid feeling. There was a manifest desire that Lindley Wells might have remained another week.

ENDORSED A MEN'S CONFERENCE

We have a letter from Charlotte E. Vickers, President of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Union of Friends, stating that the recent triennial meeting of this Union held at Muncie, Indiana, and representing all the Yearly Meetings, voted unanimously to endorse the idea of the proposed Men's Conference.

Want Ads in THE AMERICAN FRIEND are proving their worth by bringing answers. Terms given upon application.

PERSONAL MENTION

Lindley A. Wells is conducting a revival campaign at Upland, Indiana.

Dr. Sylvester Newlin has been invited to continue as pastor of the meeting at Pasadena, California.

Charles E. Tebbetts, formerly pastor of the meeting, attended Pasadena Monthly Meeting the evening of May 6th.

Joseph Elkinton and family spent some time in Ireland between the sessions of Dublin and London Yearly Meetings.

Rufus P. King, of North Carolina, attended the meeting at Washington City on May 3d, and gave a characteristic and profitable sermon.

Dr. John W. Dorland is leader of a class of Friends at Pasadena, California, in a course of study in the "History and Doctrines of Friends."

Mrs. Isabelle DeVol, missionary to China, who is at home on a furlough, addressed the missionary union at Richmond, Indiana, on May 13th.

George N. Hartley, who has spent the winter in North Carolina doing religious work for the most part, returned to his home in Fountain City on May 14th.

Rufus M. Jones is the author of a new book, "The Spiritual Reformation in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries," about to be issued by Macmillan & Company.

Charles Lescault and wife have returned to their home at Haviland, Kansas, from Rochester, Minnesota, where Mrs. Lescault underwent a surgical operation. She returns much improved in health.

John Frederick Hanson, who has been granted a minute by Oregon Yearly Meeting for gospel labors in Norway and other parts of Europe, expected to sail from New York in time to be in attendance at London Yearly Meeting.

Louise Painter Round, of Newberg, Oregon, has been in a religious campaign at Canyon City, Oregon, for some weeks past. The services have been highly appreciated. She has organized two W. C. T. U.'s recently and expects further work in the state prohibition campaign.

Arthur Chilson, missionary to Africa, attended the meeting at Poughkeepsie, New York, at the morning service on May 10th, and gave a soul stirring address to a large congregation. He spoke at Clintondale in the evening. Great interest was shown at both places and good results followed.

CLEVELAND BIBLE INSTITUTE

At the approaching twenty-second annual commencement of the Cleveland Bible Institute a class of twenty-one will receive diplomas. We look back over a year of exceptional blessing, for which we are humbly grateful to our heavenly Father. There have been enrolled during the year in all departments one hundred and thirty-nine students from eighteen states and ten religious denominations. It would not be too much to say that we have never had a better class of young people than during this year, and the character of their work has been very commendable. The present graduating class is composed of young men and women from whom we expect to hear more in the future, if they prove faithful.

The division of the school year into semesters has proved to be of considerable advantage over the term method in a number of ways. The new arrangement of the work of the Institute into three courses of study, namely, the Bible Course, the Bible Doctrine Course, and the Bible Music Course, as well as the addition to the curriculum, is meeting with much favor and filling a long-felt need. It is our purpose to add to the course of study from year to year whatever will make for a better character of manhood and womanhood, and the highest type of Christian service, as well as to strengthen the work in every possible way. We would welcome suggestions to this end from all who love the truth and the growth of the Kingdom of God. It is gratifying to note the great improvement in the Music Department. A man better fitted to carry on this work than our present director, Harper G. Smythe, would be difficult to find.

Two new men are to be added to our corps of workers during the coming year. Frank W. Lindow, a young business man in the city, who for same years has been treasurer of the First Friends' Church, is to be bookkeeper and business manager of the Institute, including the book and printing department. Merrill M. Coffin, who for the past two years has been successfully engaged in pastoral work in Michigan, is to be associated with the Extension Department as gospel singer. The work of this department has been carried on for the past three years by Edgar A. Wollam. These two young men are to engage in evangelistic work during the coming year under the Institute's direction.

Although the new building contributes much to the efficiency of the work, it is even now inadequate for our needs. It has been necessary already to rent rooms outside, and our dining room and library are both far too small. Some one who has the necessary means would do a great thing for the work of the Lord, both at home and abroad, by placing money here for this and other needs.

Sunday, May 24th, the baccalaureate sermon will be preached by Edward Mott. The senior platform meeting occurs the evening of the same day, when each member of the class will give a short history of his Christian life and especially of his call to service. Junior Public will be held on Monday evening, and on Tuesday night will occur the annual Body Guard banquet. The alumni breakfast will be served Tuesday at eleven o'clock, with commencement following in the evening.

We pray that the blessing of the Lord may continue to be manifest in this work, and that the best years are yet to come.

EARLHAM COLLEGE

PROFESSOR William Orville Mendenhall has been released from much of his work in the Department of Mathematics that he may develop at the college and within the limits of Indiana and Western Yearly Meetings Evangelistic, Missionary, Bible School, and other practical phases of church work. The definite effort of the college will be to assist in carrying out the recommendations of the Five Years Meeting as contained in the report of the Commission on the Meeting and its Pastoral Care. This is essentially constructive work and the co-operation and prayer of Friends are asked for, that it may be fruitful in extending the power and efficiency of our branch of the church. Correspondence solicited.

BIBLE SCHOOL LESSON

May 31.

Subject.—The Grateful Samaritan.

Lesson.—Luke 17: 11-19.

Golden Text.—Were there none found that returned to give glory to God, save this stranger?—Luke 17: 18.

Time.—March A.D. 30.

Place.—On border line between Samaria and Galilee.

This is a lesson which suggests a discussion of the rules of health and the curing of disease, a consideration of the motives that prompt a feeling and expression of gratitude, and a study of the problem of race hatreds and the principles of human brotherhood.

The Mission to Lepers in its world-wide work has recently issued a bulletin which shows marvelous work in caring for lepers in all parts of the world. At Chevayur, India, fifty-eight lepers participated in a Christmas feast, and ten were baptized. At Hangchow, China, thirty-one leper men are reported, and twenty-four are Christians. At Kwangju in Korea, thirty-six lepers have passed the examination for entering the catechism class.

A Bible class at Brantford, Canada, furnishes the means to support eleven lepers. At Chandkuri, thirty-one lepers were baptized, and a class of forty are preparing for it.

A report says, "The lepers did better than any contestant in the All-India S. S. Scripture examinations. Ganesh, the Brahmin, and one Christian passed with 95 per cent. marks."

The example set by Jesus in caring for the lepers is being followed in all lands with marvelous results in leading them to a knowledge of the Savior.

WESTERN YEARLY MEETING NOTICE

At the suggestion of Edward M. Woodard, Superintendent of Evangelistic work, the recent meeting of the Ministerial Association of Western Yearly Meeting held at Plainfield, Indiana, voted to ask each local meeting in the Yearly Meeting to take a collection for Nathan and Esther Frame on the second Sabbath in June. If a collection is not feasible, someone is asked to present the needs of these Friends and ask for voluntary contributions. Money for this purpose can be sent to Thomas C. Brown, Plainfield, Indiana.

BOOKS RECEIVED

"The Quakers of Iowa," by Louis T. Jones, published by the State Historical Society of Iowa, Iowa City, Iowa. Price, $2.50. 360 pages.

The work has been prepared at the request of the State Historical Society. The author is a Friend well known to many, and has had access therefore to an abundance of material which an outsider might not have been able to obtain. The book is in five parts, including "Historical Narrative," "Iowa Quaker Orthodoxy," "Minority Bodies of Friends," "Benevolent and Educational Enterprises" and "Religious and Social Life." It is written in good style, and is both interesting and highly instructive. It contains much material of general interest about Friends, and is a valuable contribution to Quaker literature.

WORK FOR PROHIBITION

The resolution for national prohibition has been reported to the National House of Representatives. Friends should write their House Member and Senators without delay, asking for favorable action on their part. Word comes that the liquor people are more active in opposing the resolution than the temperance people are in its support.

She was a life-long Friend, and accepted Christ in childhood. Her faithful life bore testimony to the wondrous power of the Lord to keep. She was a charter member of Indianapolis meeting. Two sons survive her.

Dickinson.—Joseph Howard Dickinson, only son of Joseph J. and Martha E. Dickinson, died at the home of his parents in Indianapolis, Indiana, April 26, 1914, aged twenty-seven years. Burial was at Earlham cemetery, Richmond, Indiana, on the 29th.

Her early life was spent in active work in the Church and Sunday School at her home in Knightstown, and her later years in sincere service for her Master by her loving words and deeds with her associates. Funeral services conducted by Morton Pearson, of Indianapolis, were held at the home of her sister at Knightstown. A brother, Harry L. Hobbs, of Denver, Colorado, and sister, Mrs. Mary Z. Davis, of Knightstown, Indiana, survive her.

Funeral services were conducted by Enos Harvey, pastor, and Edward M. Woodard.

Wells.—Ann Wells, wife of Isaac M. Wells, and daughter of Mordecai and Rachel Stubbs Moore, was born near West Elkton, Ohio, July 5, 1834, and died at her home near Westfield, Indiana, March 29, 1914, aged 79 years 8 months and 24 days. She was a birth-right Friend and it was ever her pleasure to be engaged in the work of the Church. For many years she was an elder and filled other responsible places in the Church. The husband and two daughters survive her.

Other obituary notices on hand have had to be left over until next week.

Glow of Health Speaks for Postum

It requires no scientific training to discover whether coffee disagrees or not.

Simply stop it for a time and use Postum in place of it, then note the beneficial effects. The truth will appear.

"Six years ago I was in a very bad condition," writes a Tenn. lady. "I suffered from indigestion, nervousness and insomnia."

"I was then an inveterate coffee drinker, but it was long before I could be persuaded that it was coffee that hurt me. Finally I decided to leave it off a few days and find out the truth."

"The first morning I left off coffee I had a raging headache, so I decided I must have something to take the place of coffee." (The headache was caused by the reaction of the coffee drug—caffeine.)

"Having heard of Postum through a friend who used it, I bought a package and tried it. I did not like it at first but after I learned how to make it right, according to directions on pkg., I would not change back to coffee for anything."

"When I began to use Postum I weighed only 117 lbs. Now I weigh 170 and as I have not taken any tonic in that time I can only attribute my present good health to the use of Postum in place of coffee."

"My husband says I am a living advertisement for Postum."

Name given by the Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum now comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

The Every-Member Canvass

Recently we asked for brief reports indicating the results of the every-member canvass among Friends. About four, possibly five, have responded. Can it be that these are all that have adopted and tried this practical and up-to-date financial method? It is still in order to report what has been done along this line.

What About the Prayer Meeting?

We invite little discussions about the conduct of the prayer meeting among Friends. In some places it is yet the mid-week meeting. In either case, we wonder to what extent the service is satisfactory, and who among Friends have some excellent ideas which ought to be incorporated into the prayer meeting and mid-week systems. Let us have a lively, practical discussion of the question from all parts of the country. A two hundred and fifty word article may be an inspiration to a hundred meetings.

Read the Advertisements

We sincerely trust that THE AMERICAN FRIEND readers are not failing to read the various advertisements which appear in the columns of this paper from time to time. The management has tried to be extremely careful about the kind of advertisements accepted. In several instances we have refused offers because we have felt that such matter was not worthy to be presented. Scarcely a week goes by that does not bring some new advertisement and there are very few instances indeed where the advertisement does not appeal to somebody. We believe they are advertisements well worthy to be patronized and it will help THE AMERICAN FRIEND if advertisers can know that preference is given to customers who desire to take space in our paper.

Friends in India

The good news is to hand from India that the Government has granted Friends three acres of land at Itarsi as a site for the new Women's Hospital, which when built will be under the care of Dr. Hilda M.

Robson and Lydia Fox. In a letter dated 20th February, Joseph Taylor reports that the site is due west of our school compound, separated from it by a road.
—London Friend.

Northfield Seminary

Northfield Seminary has issued an earnest invitation to all former students to be its guests from May 30th to June 2d, the occasion of the thirty-fifth founding of the same by D. L. Mody. The call has also been issued for the thirty-second annual series of conferences at Northfield, which have already begun and will run until October 1st. These conferences and summer schools will be held as usual in the school buildings.

College Evangelism

For religious interest in colleges, the Continent feels assured that "there never was such a winter as the one which has just passed." It mentions but a few things in support of its opinion. The "tremendous experience" of Presbyterian college evangelists in Lafayette has been duplicated in Emporia and other western institutions. The visit of "Billy" Sunday to the University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, was "the nine-days' wonder of the town." Twenty-five hundred students rose to the evangelist's invitation to pledge themselves to better lives. Seven hundred took the evangelist's hand in token of their determination to be Christians. The John R. Mott meetings in Columbia University were scarcely less influential than this. Sherwood Eddy and "Dad" Elliott were "almost staggered" at what happened in the universities of the Pacific coast. At Stanford University seventy men decided for Christ, while ninety registered as inquirers. At the University of California, "Eddy was forbidden to employ any act of public worship, either prayer or hymn, and had been told that he could not appeal to the men for religious decisions. But he preached to 1,600 men every night, pleaded with the 1,200 that stayed to after-meeting and, in spite of restrictions, saw 140 students definitely accept the Master. Besides these, 400 others enlisted in Bible study and signed a prayer pledge. Many of those led to Christ were avowed agnostics before the meetings began." Elliott, in the University of Washington and in Oregon Agricultural College, in nine days, held twenty-seven meetings and brought 150 men into avowed Christian discipleship.—United Presbyterian.

Trying to Get More Chaplains

The Federal Council of Churches is making a special effort to increase the number of chaplains in the American navy from twenty-four to fifty-two. The proposition has been stricken out of the House Bill upon a point of order and efforts are now being made by the Council to induce the Senate to restore the paragraph. Anyone interested is asked to write to the Chairman of the Senate Committee, Senator Benjamin R. Tillman, in behalf of the proposition.

"I Am With You Always"

"And lo, I am with you always." These are the comforting words of Jesus for the discipleship of all the ages. Sometimes the Church apparently fails to remember this assuring promise and plans its operations in cold methodic fashion as though everything depended upon its earthly workmanship. The life more abundant is not the product of human design. He who sees the path of duty and fails to follow its lead through fear of the unknown realm toward which it points the way has forgotten this blessed promise.

Jesus came to earth to found a kingdom of which there shall be no end, a kingdom in which there should be a social order of brotherhood where love reigns supreme, an economic order of justice wherein human interests are correlated with equity, a spiritual order in which the Divine is engrafted into human purposes and thought and where righteousness is the controlling element in all human activities. To the Church has been committed the workmanship and oversight of this kingdom on earth. From this high commission it dare not turn aside. Its operations are with the inhabitants of earth, but the source of its inspiration and power is with God.

The Church is God's representative on earth. Jesus declared himself to be the good shepherd, but to faithful discipleship has He committed the task of superintending His interests among men. Amid the sin and vice and turbulence of the world, with much of the social order organized in antagonism to the righteousness of God, the task of the Church would seem well nigh hopeless were it not for the assurance of the continual presence of Christ to inspire, to direct, to comfort, to energize, to give the assurance of efficient workmanship.

Jesus is the light of the world, and to His Church He says, "Even so let your light shine before men." There is a realm of contending philosophies all about us; there are standards of ethics that accord not with the truth; there are problems that try men's souls, and the human mind is finite and prone to error. What a comforting assurance it is to have the consciousness of a Divine presence amid all the perplexities of life, amid the problems that call for keen analysis, amid the paradoxes that confront us at every turn!

Individually no less than collectively is the presence of Christ a holy benediction. Indeed the last and vital test of the power of Christ in human life is with the individual soul. It has been said recently that "All the hope of Christianity in the world turns on the question whether those who thus seek the Lord in the quiet of their own souls do find Him present and answering there." Therein lies the proof of the gospel claim to regenerate and transform human life. "The Spirit himself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are children of God." It is this personal testimony to the abiding presence of Jesus in the consecrated human soul that will cause the doubts of the skeptic to vanish, that will overthrow all the infidelities of the ages. No human philosophy can despoil a faith that is born of the actual experience of knowing God.

It is an age when it is so easy to lose that fine sense of contact with things Divine. There are distractions upon every hand. The sense of sight enraptures the mind. The sense of sound calls us into alluring fields. The sense of touch and of taste tempt us to bodily sin. But it is the spiritual vision that counts. It is the call of the spirit that must be obeyed. It is the spiritual feast that enriches the life. "Christ in you, the hope of glory" is the only sure foundation. Life at its best is life that enjoys the conscious companionship of Jesus.

Whether in sorrow or in rejoicing; in adversity or in success; whether in perplexity or temptation or despair, or whether in the midst of hope with our faces set toward the dawn, it is the highest attainment of human experience to be able to realize that Christ's promise to His disciples is still being fulfilled. It is an experience which it is the privilege of all men to know. With such an assurance and with such companionship, there is no task too perplexing to undertake, no burden too heavy to be borne. They who, in the clear light of day and having a sense of earthly needs can still keep their vision fixed upon the eternal with the consciousness of the abiding presence of Christ within will ever be the world's greatest prophets.

His Face

BY ELLISON R. PURDY

When thou saidst, seek ye my face; my heart said unto thee, thy face, Jehovah, will I seek.—Psa. 27: 8.

The Psalmist's God has a face. He interprets the Unseen in the terms of the human form just as we read elsewhere of God's "rising up early," making "bare his holy arm," and the firmament showing "his handiwork."

"God is Spirit.
His house is by the seaside.
The tiniest flower that blooms is his temple.
The whole earth is full of his glory."

All nature "is the form and product of his ceaseless activity."

"From the mountain's rocky peak
Down to where the goldenrod
Bends above the mossy sod,
Everywhere the breath of God."

We know this. We know that the Divine Being is pervading all things, but we need texts like this one to hold our hearts fast to the thought of the "Great Companion, the Father and Friend.

In our mysticism God may be so near, so pervasive, as not to be at all. We may lose the Person too, in our theories about him. Try it on human friendships. Who ever found a friend to be the exact equivalent of one's theories of friendship! Think of a man who, wishing a wife, builds a home and furnishes it, buys a hat and dress, gloves and shoes, and then seeks a woman who will look well in the house, and will fit to her trousseau! Thus it is with one who seeks a person to fit the specifications of his system.

Our best religious experiences are decidedly like those which obtain in the noblest friendships. Let us seek His face.

Religion is a matter of the heart. "When thou saidst . . . My heart said." Religion is not to be classed with our conventions, but with the things that brighten the eye and quicken the pulse. For years a clerk had given faithful attention to most exacting and confining duties. When dying, he said: "Don't talk to me of death; I have been dead and buried for twenty years." Holiness is not a sarcophagus. Religion may be a recreation. It involves application, struggle, discipline, responsibility, but this may be coupled with the deepest, sweetest promptings of the heart.

"And all the time the heart o' me,
The better, sweeter part o' me,
Is sobbin' for the robin
In the fields of Ballyclare."

God's face is our Ballyclare. There must be more than a "Thus saith the Lord." My heart must say so, too.

"And all the time the soul o' me,
The part beyond control o' me,
Is sighin' to be flyin'
To the fields of Ballyclare."

True religion is a response. "When thou saidst . . . My heart said." It does not begin at low altitudes and work up. It begins on high as the sun draws sparkling crystals out of muddy pools. At Babel they began low, built up, and the end was confusion and failure. Pentecost began on high, came down and lifted up, and wrought unity and power, and the end is not yet!

Many prayers fall back dead because they were dead when they started. Living prayers,—all living experiences,—are born from above. "The Spirit maketh intercession." "When thou saidst seek. . . . My heart said."

To find His face is reconciliation. God was in Christ Jesus reconciling the world unto himself. He reveals His face in Jesus and His cross. The cross of Christ is a declaration that God will go to the "utmost boundaries of Divine possibilities" in His effort to redeem men and bring them into fellowship with Himself. Blessed is the man who finds His face, and beholds there the radiance of pardoning love.

"Oh, be ye reconciled,
Thus saith my Lord and King.
Oh, be ye reconciled to God."

In His face is power. The man who has never beheld in a human face something which brought him strength and courage, has missed one of life's choicest experiences. The human face with its noblest dynamic is but an illustration of God's face. There we find equipment for the severest tasks and the fiercest temptations; there confidence and hope; something there which says to us, "Be strong and let thy heart take courage."

Mr. Kelman in his book, "The Faith of Robert Louis Stevenson," tells how Stevenson's grandfather was once upon a drifting ship, near a lee shore on a stormy night. He could hear the awful waves and thought they were beyond help. He went on deck. There he saw the pilot lashed to the wheel steadily turning the vessel away from destruction inch by inch. The pilot turned and smiled upon him. He went below again, saying to himself, "It's all right; it will be all right in the morning. I have seen the pilot's face, and the pilot smiled."

We may see our Pilot "face to face" now, and in the smile of His countenance find assurance and peace.

Here is a suggestion of reflection. If we see His face, we must reflect it. Dr. Moffat translates II. Cor. 4: 5, 6, as follows: "It is Christ Jesus as Lord, not myself, that I proclaim; I am simply a servant of yours for Jesus' sake. For God who said, 'Light shall shine out of darkness,' has shone within my heart to illuminate men with the knowledge of God's glory in the face of Christ." Let us reflect that face. Let us be radiant Christians. "If His light shine so brightly in thee, Annie," said the Scotch woman to her daughter, "what must He be in Himself?"

The dictionary defines "black" as "destitute of light incapable of reflecting it," and "white" as "reflecting all the colors of the spectrum." Are you black or white? Do you try merely to absorb the meaning of His face, or will you reflect it? Reflect it with all the radiant powers of your gifts and talents? And even though you "possess this treasure in frail vessels of earth to show that the transcending power belongs to God," not to yourself, will you "illuminate men with the knowledge of God's glory in the face of Christ?"

Wilmington, Ohio.

Seeing the Invisible

BY C. CLEVER, D.D.

It is curious that such an apparent contradiction should lie at the very foundation of Christian endurance. We are not supposed to believe in something that is contrary to reason, but we are to believe in something that is invisible. This is the encomium heaped upon the great lawgiver, which distinguished him from the rest in that great picture gallery of the faithful, the eleventh chapter of the Hebrews. It was no variant fancy that nerved him for the task, which so often tried his soul. It was the very substance of things hoped for, that enabled him to choose to suffer affliction with the people of God, rather than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season. While there were occasions that the capture of the invisible was for the moment desicated, yet he always recovered himself, and with a new conquering spirit urged the lagging and wavering hosts forward to the promised land.

There is to us often a vagueness about the invisible and heavenly, and so unbelief easily turns us back from the very borders of our promised inheritance. Even though the fruits of the land, for which we are bound, be spread out before us by angelic hands, we refuse to go upward and onward. With all the precious promises falling upon us and about us, pure as the falling snow, we magnify the difficulties and envy those who are still so charmed by the necromancy of the world, that they have not made the first effort to break away from it.

It is by faith that Moses saw the invisible. This fifth sense, as it is sometimes designated, is as strenuous in its efforts to serve the soul as the eye of the body. To see a thing is to be assured of its reality and presence. Sometimes it is seen only partially because of a haze or cloud. But seeing is believing. Upon this we risk all our physical welfare, or refuse to take another step because of the revelation of danger which means physical death. Now faith is not something unreal. It would be a caricature upon the love of our Heavenly Father to think for a moment that the most gracious possession could vary in its revelations. It is the power which enables the soul to endure, with the assurance of ultimate victory. Its revelations have nothing shadowy about them. It is the quintessence of personality to be able to say: "I believe." There is nothing which brings heavenly possibilities into touch with the soul, with redemptive energy but faith. This is not some faint dream, that for a moment sweeps into our life and then is gone, leaving a vacancy which makes the last state worse than the first. Its possessors subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions, quenched the power of fire, escaped the edge of the sword, from weakness were made strong, waxed mighty in war, turned to flight the armies of the aliens. Surely a power which has such a galaxy of triumphs to its credit need not hang its head in the presence of all the triumphs, of all the ages of the wisest and wittiest of men. As the sensitive plate of the photographer records millions of stars which are otherwise invisible with the aid of the most powerful telescopes, so faith reveals potencies and possibilities which elude the keenest intellectual effort and visions of the proudest imagination.

This power is capable of training. To practice the presence of God has come to be a term somewhat covering this phase of this article. There is a growth in faith as well as in grace. In conversation with an oculist, I inquired why so many of our young people were compelled to wear glasses. He said, "Look, what do you see?" I answered, "A brick house on the opposite side of the street." Your eyes were made to look farther, and we do so much near looking. We were made to look at stars, to sweep the heavens clustered with constellations, compared with which our earth is but a grain of sand, to see the mountains crowned with the forest kings, and to watch the ships coming home so far out in the ocean in the beginning that only the top sails are visible. So this spiritual eye has been made to see things invisible. It has been compelled to look at the things that are near till its unused capacity for the farther things has been injured. "No man knows to what heavenly splendors his eyes may be opened if he will only cultivate and cherish faith." This does not mean that ignorance is the mother of faith. But a knowledge, however acute, will never supercede the necessity of faith, and nothing that marks the triumphs of human genius can in any way hinder faith's triumphs.

Our Catechism beautifully informs its student as to the manner by which this spiritual sense shall be strengthened. The agency is the Holy Ghost. He works faith in our hearts. Through fellowship with Him there is awakened that confidence by which a sense of the invisible becomes a dominating influence in our lives. The means used is the Word of God. This earnestly and prayerfully enjoyed will enable us to see the Christ. And seeing Him we shall be satisfied. There is a whole world of beauty and inspiration open to the natural eye. The loss of this power of vision at once produces an irreparable loss. But what is this compared to the vision which sees Christ, and with Him sees all things that are in heaven, and all things in earth which are related to Him who created all things? With the loss of this spiritual vision there is no faith in Christ. And he that believeth not shall be damned. Blessed were those who saw the incarnate Christ and believed; but more blessed are those who have not seen, and yet have believed.

A Quaker Innovation

BY RUFUS M. JONES

George Fox in his Journal reports that in his years of search for light, he came upon a sort of people which held that women have no souls (adding, he says, in a light manner) no more than a goose. But Fox was ready for them with an appropriate text, and he continues, "I reprov'd them and told them that was not right; for Mary said 'My soul doth magnify the Lord!'"

This estimate of woman which Fox discovered in his travels is probably darker than the average estimate of those times, but about the last thing any self-respecting Englishman of that seventeenth century would have dreamed of would have been such a radical reconstruction of the Christian Church as to put women on precisely the same level as men, and to wipe out all sex-distinction in matters of religion. Just this innovation the Quakers, led by Fox, actually made.

The serious attempt to constitute the Church of both men and women and to give to women all the spiritual privileges, rights, duties and functions which belonged to men, had once before been tried in the history of Christianity. The Montanists of the second and third centuries, possessed with enthusiasm for the restoration of prophecy, and for the formation of a Church guided by prophets rather than one governed by bishops, threw the door wide open for women; proposed a type of Church in which both sexes shared alike and, not only in theory but in practice as well, raised women to the full spiritual stature of men. While this Sibylline movement was at its height women prophesied, taught, baptized, consecrated the Eucharist and had all the privileges of martyrdom and sainthood, as that extraordinary document, The Passion of Saint Perpetua, vividly shows. But this movement was ruthlessly stamped out, and the Church which was to do the work of the Middle Ages was so organized that not only was no woman eligible to office or position in the hierarchy, but no man even, who was married to a wife could share in it.

The Reformation swept away the celibate priesthood and wiped out the convent within the Protestant domain, but it left the Church severely masculine in all its higher activities and functions. Even if they had desired to make the innovation and constitute the Reformed churches of both men and women, the Reformers with their conception of the infallibility of Scripture would have been confronted with the inhibition of St. Paul's words: "Let the women keep silence in the Churches, for it is not permitted them to speak. If they would learn anything let them ask their husbands at home." One wonders what the poor husbandless women were to do!

George Fox nowhere discusses the woman problem; he makes no announcement of principles or of a program, but he inaugurates a movement in which from the very first the age-long discrimination against women was entirely silent. Here is an entry in his Journal for the year 1667: "I advised the setting up of a girls' school at Shacklewell, for instructing them in whatsoever things are civil and useful in creation." Just as though they had souls! And as the Quaker movement progressed and developed, there came into existence a church organization in which personality, gifts, and specific qualifications were the only tests of fitness for service—the divine right not of Kings and not of Bishops, but of common men and women was here recognized and quietly practiced. And once again, as we shall see, women had all the privileges of martyrdom.

The first person to accept the views and the type of Christianity promulgated by George Fox was, as far as can be determined by the data in existence, a woman named Elizabeth Hooton of Nottinghamshire, who became the first preacher of the Quaker faith after the founder himself. It is also a striking fact that women were the first to undertake the propagation of the Quaker message in London, in the two English universities and in the American Colonies. Two young women from Kendal, one of whom was only seventeen, made a tour of the Oxford colleges and churches in 1654, "preaching repentance and declaring the word of the Lord," as the phraseology of the time has it. We are informed by contemporary Quaker documents that "the black tribe of scholars" gave them savage treatment, and that the Oxford authorities whipped them unmercifully. It is also reported in a quaint contemporary document that Elizabeth Williams "came out of the North Country with ye Message of ye Lord and went about ye citty of Oxford crying Repentance to ye People and was evilly entreated of ye Rude Schollars and townsmen, being Hurried up and down ye streets and fields by ym, untill Night drew on and then Hurried into a Poole of water called by ye Name of Giles' Poole." This same Elizabeth Williams with a young woman named Mary Fisher tried their persuasions also at Cambridge. The scholars, in the quaint language of the time, showed "froth and levity" and "mocked and derided them." The two women were taken to the Market Cross and whipped until the blood ran down their bodies, while they prayed God to forgive their persecutors. This same Mary Fisher, with Ann Austin as companion, were the first Quakers to visit the Western Hemisphere. They landed in Boston the 11th of July, 1656, and a contemporary chronicler says that the coming of these two women shook the established peace and order of the colony, as if a formidable army had invaded its borders. The women's books were seized and burned as being "corrupt, heretical and blasphemous." They themselves were committed to prison after their bodies had been searched for tokens of witchcraft. They were deprived of light and all writing materials and their prison windows were closely boarded up, and a fine of five pounds was laid on anyone who should speak to them. After five weeks of confinement under these conditions the two Quaker women were transported to Barbadoes and the master of the vessel put under a hundred pound bond not to import any more!

As the colony of Massachusetts roused itself to stem the Quaker invasion and finally determined to inflict the death penalty on Quakers who came back after being banished, the Quaker women met the challenge with an almost unparalleled boldness. A band of volunteers, mostly women, formed in Rhode Island, joined by others from Salem, and went up to Boston, "moved of the Lord," as the old account has it, "to look your bloody laws in the face and to accompany those who shall suffer by them," and one of the women carried linen with her to wrap the bodies of those who were to be martyred.

The story of the hanging of Mary Dyer on Boston Common for the persistent part she took in the battle for religious liberty and for the spiritual rights of woman, has often been told, and that moving scene when at the foot of the gallows she was offered her life if she would go home and keep quiet, she replied, "I cannot. In the will of the Lord God I came and in His will I abide faithful to the end," is well known. What is not so well known is the amazing endurance, the tenacity and unconquerable spirit of Elizabeth Hooton, the first woman minister, in her attempt to break down the infamous "Cart and Whip Act" of Colonial Massachusetts.

She was at the time of her New England sufferings advanced in years, being over sixty. She had made her way to Virginia from Barbadoes, and had traveled all the way on foot or on horseback from Virginia, through incredible hardships, to Boston, where she was at once thrust into prison. Being released from prison she was conveyed to the limits of the Colony and left in the wilderness, making her way as best she could to Rhode Island. She went from there to Barbadoes and took ship again for Boston. Here she was taken by the constable and put on ship for Virginia, and after suffering imprisonment for the faith there she returned to England, but only for the purpose of carrying out her original plan—to preach in New England!

She now procured from the King a special license to permit her to build a house in America, and with the King's document sailed for Boston. Here she applied for liberty to build a house for herself to live in and for Friends to meet in. The privilege was stoutly refused, and she undertook a difficult religious visit through the Piscataqua region of New Hampshire.

At Hampton she was imprisoned. At Dover she was put in the stocks and kept four days in prison. Then she made her way back to Cambridge, where she was locked up in a "close, foul dungeon," and kept two days and nights without food or drink. A Friend, for there were by this time convinced Friends in almost all the New England towns, hearing of her sufferings, brought her some milk for which he was fined five pounds. An order was next issued for whipping this poor woman out of the jurisdiction, though she showed the King's document granting her the privilege of owning a house wherever she would in the Colony. She was tied to a post in Cambridge and given ten lashes with a three corded knotted whip. Then she was taken to Watertown, where she received ten lashes more. On a cold, frosty morning she was brought into Dedham, where, tied to a cart, the tortured body had ten lashes more. Torn and bleeding, after a long day's journey, she was left at night in the woods, and by what seemed to her friends a miraculous preservation she arrived next day at the town of Rebooth, R. I. (now the town of Seekonk), and made her way to Newport.

Notwithstanding this usage, to us seemingly unendurable, Elizabeth Hooton returned to Cambridge, where, after being "abused by a wicked crew of Cambridge scholars," she was whipped again, first in the town of Cambridge and then from constable to constable through three towns toward Rhode Island. Again she went back to Boston and endeavored to give her message. She was this time taken to the House of Correction and given ten stripes, and then whipped at a cart's tail through Roxbury, Dedham and Medfield, and left, at the end of her whipping, in the woods. She got to a town where there were Friends who refreshed her, and with indomitable persistence, she went back to Boston. She was again whipped out of town and threatened with death if she returned. We are told that "her inward consolations did so abound that she was able to bear all her afflictions in holy triumph, and in humble meekness she declared that she was willing, for the love she bore the souls of men, to suffer all and more for the seed's sake." She can perhaps be forgiven for having shown undue appreciation of Governor Endicott's death, on the occasion of his funeral, for which she was again put in prison.

There is almost no end to the story of the endurance and sufferings of these Quaker women of the seventeenth century, both in England and in America. Some of them under the awful pressure did fanatical things, such as breaking empty bottles in church as a "sign" that the minister was empty and hollow, but for the most part it is a noble record and in the end they completely won what they so valiantly fought for, and now, among Friends the women stand side by side with men in all religious affairs.

Advance Steps in Evangelism

W. E. Biederwolf, General Secretary of the Commission on Evangelism of the Federal Council of Churches, has issued a circular letter in which he emphasizes the need of aggressive and well directed evangelism. The plans call for the creation of Evangelistic Committees, of credential Committees to study the fitness of men for Evangelistic work in each denomination, the co-operation with Theological Seminaries, the conducting of conferences for pastors and interested laymen and the creation of a body of leaders calling the people of God to a realizing sense of their responsibility for the unsaved and dealing with valid methods of Evangelistic work.

Financing the Work of the Church

VII. THE SIMULTANEOUS EVERY-MEMBER CANVASS

A. What It Is Not. It is not a canvass made by mailing letters to members (except in cases of non-residents), or by distributing pledge-cards among members at meeting or some other convenient opportunity chances to offer. It is not a labor-saving device for raising money. There is nothing magical about its working. For its success it means a whole lot of very real work by numerous people. After all, is not the tap-root of our difficulty in financing the work of the Church to be found, not in the penuriousness of Friends as a denomination, but in our lack of willingness to devote adequate time and effort in a systematic way to the work of securing funds? When one thinks of the usual cost, in terms of somebody's thought, time and effort, which is the price of success in raising money through voluntary contributions for other public enterprises, the marvel is that our haphazard, easy-going plans for raising church funds should bring in such large returns as they do.

B. What Is It? It is an orderly, business-like plan for Christian team-work by church members with church members (and non-members who by their attendance upon the services of the Church or by other relationships to it are affiliated with it), for the purpose of laying before them the financial requirements of the work of the Church and securing their contributions to it. The team is composed of a sufficiently large number of persons to efficiently perform the work. They first make their own pledges. They then divide up the membership list of the congregation among themselves, not upon geographical lines or other considerations of mere convenience in making the canvass, but upon grounds of varied adaptabilities to dealing with the different classes and individualities among the members and non-members of the meeting. To this end the committee should be selected with great care,—men, women, young people,—somebody adapted to every type and condition to be found in the congregation. This may sometimes best be done through a nomination by the Finance Committee of the Monthly Meeting. Often it will be desirable for two canvassers to work together upon the same list. The pledge system is absolutely essential to the best results of the Every-Member Canvass. Sometimes it is only reasonable that an individual or a family should have time for consideration of the amount which they ought to pledge. This makes a second visit upon them by the canvassers necessary. At the final completion of the canvass the total result should be publicly announced to the congregation.

C. What Are Its Advantages? This question can be best answered by the following testimonies coming from sources where the Every-Member Canvass has been fully tried out.

(1) It gets this bit of work out of the way in the congregation for the entire year, by providing funds for all the regular work of the Church.

(2) By doing it simultaneously it is done faster and better.

(3) It has one subject in the mind of all the members of the congregation at the same time as a stimulus to the general interest and liberality of all.

(4) Where an efficient Every-Member Canvass is made it brings the important work and the needs of every great department of church activity to the attention of every member and affiliated person in a practical, business-like way which appeals both to his judgment and his conscience.

(5) It constitutes an educational agency of great value.

(6) If it is made in the right spirit and manner, a specific, personal appeal will bring results when a public appeal to the whole congregation, however forcible, would be shifted or forgotten.

(7) It will increase the number of givers and the aggregate amount of the gifts.

(8) It will make the financial support of the Church not spasmodic, but uniform, steady and dependable.

(9) It accords with the teachings of the New Testament and is calculated to bring definite blessings upon the Church.

(10) The carefully cultivated and canvassed congregations are the thriving congregations.

It scarcely needs to be said that service upon the Finance Committee of the Monthly Meeting, the compiling of the annual budget, the prosecution of the canvass by the team and the inauguration of the plan of weekly envelope collections will call for individual members, and especially men, to give unstintedly of their time and their business ability. Here the spiritual elements to be incorporated in all this work need to be distinctly emphasized. Christian men may here find an exceptional opportunity to prove that business can be made a religious thing, if it is engaged in with a holy motive.

Finally, in order to its success, the Every-Member Canvass must be made a work of prayer and faith. Intercessory prayer for God's blessing upon it by the whole congregation, by the Finance Committee of the Monthly Meeting, by the team of canvassers collectively and individually, is an indispensable prerequisite for fruitful results. A Simultaneous Every-Member Canvass recognized primarily as a prayer movement cannot fail to yield at least two by-products of great value to the Church, aside from the financial returns which it brings. The first of these will be noticed in the deepened spiritual life of the meeting. The second will be seen in the number of gifts, hitherto dormant and undiscovered, that it will bring into the active service of the Church.

For the Consideration of Friends

We have often wondered if Friends ever stop to think what it means when they write a letter asking to have their AMERICAN FRIEND discontinued.

It means simply and only that somebody else has to go down into his pocket to make up the amount, for the paper is not yet on a paying basis.

We have often wondered if the thousands of non-subscribers among Friends ever stop to think what their failure to support THE AMERICAN FRIEND means.

It means, first, that other Friends are forced to pay an extra amount and assume an extra burden because of it; and it means, second, that these non-subscribers are contributing their full share to a possible situation in which the Church as a whole will be left without a periodical.

We know how easy it is for thousands of our Friends to conclude that they have no responsibility in the support of the church periodical. Probably they have never given a thought to the matter, or if they have, they regard the paper as they do any other paper, as being the property of somebody else, who has seen fit to invest his money in the enterprise and is, therefore, alone responsible for its success or failure.

But in the case of THE AMERICAN FRIEND, there is no somebody else. The Publication Board has no money invested in the enterprise. They are simply directors, appointed by the Five Years Meeting and authorized to see that a weekly periodical is published for the Church.

The editor and manager has no money invested in it, and is simply an employee of the Board, acting for the Church in carrying out the purposes of the Five Years Meeting.

If Friends generally will feel no responsibility in the publication of the paper, either a comparatively few must assume the burden for the whole Church, or the Church must be left without a periodical.

There is no reason why any one family should do its share in supporting THE AMERICAN FRIEND, that does not apply with equal force to the five other families who are now failing or refusing to do their share in furnishing the backing for the paper.

When so many fail to bear their share of the burden, somebody must meet the responsibility of the deficiency, or the enterprise must necessarily fail. There are no stockholders to assess; there is no reserve fund upon which to draw, except a voluntary guarantee fund subscribed for a limited time. And every dollar paid from that temporary fund is being paid because some other family has failed to meet its share of responsibility in this publication enterprise.

Many of our meetings support pastors. We wonder what would be the status of a meeting that had called a pastor, and then five out of every six families shirked responsibility and compelled the other one-sixth to bear all the burdens of financial support. It would not require a prophet to tell the speedy doom of such a meeting.

What would happen in a meeting in which, after the membership had been enrolled, five out of every six families refused absolutely to meet their share of local expenses, of Yearly Meeting and Quarterly Meeting appropriations, of the various benevolences, and compelled the one-sixth to meet all the bills?

These are parallel situations to the situation of THE AMERICAN FRIEND. The whole Church must come to feel its responsibility in this matter, or the whole Church is bound to suffer grievously because of it.

It is a condition that means vastly more to the Society of Friends than the mere matter of publishing a paper. A question of loyalty is involved, a question of fundamental responsibility, for if the major part of the whole Church persists in being careless or indifferent, or grossly negligent, or willfully disloyal about its obligations to such a vital institution as a denominational periodical, owned and controlled by the Church, what hope is there that any institution of the Church will be permanently and adequately supported?

We would be doing less than our duty, if we failed to impress upon all Friends the urgency of their responsibility in this matter.

The question of the need of a denominational paper like THE AMERICAN FRIEND is not here involved except indirectly, for the Five Years Meeting has already passed upon that question.

It may not be amiss to suggest, however, that there is no other agency or department among Friends that has such potentiality as does THE AMERICAN FRIEND, both in the matter of unifying the spirit of our denominational life and activities and of stimulating the membership as a whole to constructive, consecrated endeavor as one body of Christian believers.

The time has come to emphasize the fact that he who fails to read THE AMERICAN FRIEND week by week, will soon lose out as a factor in our denominational life, and will become a back number. The men and the women whose vision is bounded by the local horizon alone will not become the prophets of a larger Quakerism adequate to meet the needs of a progressive civilization.

Finally, let us say that if there be any fault in the paper itself that makes it unworthy of patronage, that can be remedied by the Board and by a change in the management.

To all new subscribers we will send THE AMERICAN FRIEND until January 1, 1915, for 75 cents. Pastors, agents and interested Friends, please take notice and call this offer to the attention of the membership generally.

Reverses Its Decision

The National Society of the D. A. R., which went on record at its annual meeting in 1913 in favor of the restoration of the canteen, has at its recent meeting in Washington City repealed its action and has put itself on record as not desiring to consider issues upon which its members are greatly divided.

The Pastor Among His People

BY LEANAH HOBSON

The word pastor or pastors is found nine times in Scripture; eight times in the Old Testament and one in the New. It invariably means a shepherd, one who watches over and cares for the flock, leading, guiding, defending and feeding them. One of the most beautiful and impressive scenes of Scripture is that of the Bethlehem shepherds keeping watch over their flocks at night, when an angel announced the birth of Christ and a great chorus of heavenly host sang "On earth peace and good will to men."

This is the pastor's office and his work is to shepherd the flock committed to his care. In speaking or thinking of the minister's work we are not to forget that he is to be a preacher of the Word, and no minister for any length of time can maintain himself in any prominent pulpit of the land unless he feeds the flock of God; unless he brings forth things new and old from the marvelous treasure house of truth.

It is equally true, however, and should not be forgotten that no minister ever did his best work unless he was a pastor as well as preacher of the Word. For the preacher to meet the wants of the people he must know the people, their joys, sorrows, hopes, fears, struggles, triumphs as well as their difficulties. In a word he must know their spiritual condition. We will fail if we live apart from the people. How can a minister adapt himself to the people of whom he knows little? The great doctrines of Scripture may be preached with all earnestness and fidelity. The great principles of the gospel may be expounded and urged with more or less power upon the people of whom little if anything is known, but if the desired message in any large measure is to accomplish its mission, we must have adaptation to the present experience and present needs of those addressed. Hence the great importance of a preacher knowing his people, to say nothing of the additional interest which his people will take in him and in his message, because they recognize him as personally interested in them.

When the pastor has the confidence of the people he can lead them. He is not to be their Lord nor is he to sit in judgment on them. He is rather to be their comforter and to ascertain their needs so as truly to be their servant, helping them to bear burdens and leading them into a larger knowledge of Him who giveth all blessings.

Believing that ministers can acquire and cultivate the gift of the pastor in a larger or smaller degree, I pray we may see and grasp our opportunity along this line. Where the family altar is neglected the pastor can help to re-establish it and thus do a work in the home where first of all a revival is needed. When the homes which represent the church are what they should be, the church will be what it should be. Friends expect their pastors to visit them and pray with and for them, thus making it easy for this work to be done. I do not say that one should have prayer with the family every time a call is made, but I confess to my humiliation that sometimes when I have neglected it, I have found afterward that it was a disappointment to members of the family, and I have yet to find a home in or out of the church where I was not received well when I asked the privilege of praying with them.

Interesting Letter from Alaska

DEERING, ALASKA, March 3, 1914.

The American Friend:

It has now been more than seven months since we have seen a copy of THE AMERICAN FRIEND. We feel the loss very keenly. Being entirely out of touch with the great body of our Church makes one feel more appreciative of its value than when more closely associated. Again, we are closely connected with the mission work of the church. We are sensible of our needs for the prayers and sympathy so generously contributed by the throbbing centers of power.

We are now located near the Arctic circle, in a small village of white miners and prospectors, representatives from many nations, with a goodly population of Eskimos.

There is an earnest working church, a Monthly Meeting, Sunday School and C. E. Society, all officered and conducted by the Eskimo people. There is not a man, woman or child in the village old enough to be converted who has not made an open confession of faith in Christ and many seem truly filled with the Holy Spirit.

Our work has not been on the line of evangelism so much as to teach the people what to do with the experience which they gave every evidence of having when we first arrived. The foundation work having been faithfully accomplished, we have had but to build the structure of Christian character and prudent exercise of the gifts bestowed upon them. It has been a new as well as pleasant work.

Through the long dark Arctic night of nearly one month we have toiled by lamp and lantern light most of the time. But the sun shines again with some strength and indeed we are thankful. Here is a short program of our gospel work:

Sunday, Bible School at ten o'clock, preaching at eleven; afternoon, at four, gospel service and C. E. meeting. Monday evening, home night in the village, when every family is expected to assemble at home for the evening. Tuesday evening, men's meeting in one part of the village and women's meeting in another part. Wednesday evening, prayer meeting at school house, with Monthly Meeting on the last Wednesday evening in each month. Thursday evening, singing school (all attend). Friday evening, the Bible readers conduct a meeting in the village after they have had a lesson of instruction at the school house. Saturday evening, the Sunday School teachers' meeting (all attend). And in the meantime we visit and dispense medicine and attend four reindeer herds and teach school five days in the week to pay our expenses while we preach.

Sincerely,

CHAS. REPLOGLE.

AT MOORESVILLE, INDIANA

The Christian Endeavor of the Friends' Church at Mooresville has greatly increased its membership by means of a red and blue contest. The Endeavor had lagged for some time before the coming of our young minister and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. Clyde Watson, who have shown untiring zeal in the formation of a young people's society. Under their efficient leadership the Christian Endeavor has reached a membership of two hundred and twenty-eight, the largest Christian Endeavor ever known in the history of this meeting. The society was divided into two equal sections and a graded tabulation was kept by the captains of each side. The contest was not only for new members, but for punctuality and church attendance, 100 per cent. being given for each new member, 50 per cent. for being present at Endeavor meeting, 25 per cent. for being "on time," and 25 per cent. for remaining at the evening service. The reds wore red buttons and the blues wore blue buttons, and each section had its respective side in the Christian Endeavor room.

The contest was properly conducted with an unlimited enthusiasm on the part of the captains and their various helpers. Frobel Utterback, captain of the blues, and Wallace Hadley, captain of the reds, were untiring and ardent supporters of their respective sides. Twice during the contest the large assembly room of the church was pressed into service because of the inadequate seating capacity of the regular Christian Endeavor room. The reds won by a narrow margin with a score of 27,425 and will be entertained by the blues at a banquet in the near future. We feel that never before in the history of the church in Mooresville was there a brighter outlook for future work. The society as a whole is alive and at work and the picture on the front page shows some of our lively boosters for God's great work among the young people of Mooresville.

PLAINFIELD ACADEMY

The evening of May 15th was quite a gala occasion for the Friends in Plainfield, Indiana, especially interested as they are in Central Academy, which is located at this place. The urgent need and the desire of many to have a gymnasium culminated in a banquet, the proceeds of which were to form a nest egg for the fund.

The Ladies' Aid and the students of Central set about materializing a vision of the faculty. The banquet was served in the new church dining-room, which was a scene of artistic beauty as the company entered. The table decorations and menu were carried out in harmony with the Academy colors of red and white. Mr. Hobbs of the Bridgeport Nursery donated a load of flowers, the students and members of the Alumni arranging the same, and the fine cooks of the Aid spreading a feast which was a delight to all. More than $90.00 was realized from this.

Professor Simon Hester, Principal, as toastmaster of the evening, introduced C. M. Hobbs, who has been a most loyal supporter of the school as patron and also as President of the Board. He was followed by Charles Reeves, of Indianapolis, B. W. Anderson, Dr. Amos Carter and Willard O. Trueblood, all of whom spoke with emphasis on the place of private schools and their great service. The last speaker called attention to subscriptions slips which had been passed and when these were collected there had been over $600.00 subscribed toward the gymnasium. This with the banquet proceeds amounted to more than $700.00.

AT POUGHKEEPSIE

Poughkeepsie Monthly Meeting of Friends was held May 21, at Poughkeepsie. After a supper, Herbert L. Huffman, pastor at Clinton Corners, gave a very acceptable address on "The Value of Hymns in Worship," after which a very interesting business meeting was held. Six new members were received into fellowship with us, four by request as active members and two associate. Remarks were made urging not only the making of other Christians but better ones in helping to develop the character of those who come into membership with us.

NINE PARTNERS' QUARTER

Nine Partners' Quarterly Meeting, New York, was held at Millbrook, May 8th and 9th. At the meeting on ministry and oversight the topic for consideration was "Should Friends fraternize more with other denominations." In the evening a Quarterly Meeting Conference was addressed by William J. Sayres, of Poughkeepsie, on "Self Analysis." On Saturday the meeting for worship was held at 10:30, followed by meeting of Committees and lunch. At 1:30 the business session was held.

AN EXTRA DAY

The committee having in charge the program of London Yearly Meeting this week, decided to extend the sessions a day, so that the meeting would close on the 28th.

WILMINGTON COLLEGE

There will be a grand reunion of Wilmington College students, past and present, on the College campus, Wilmington, Ohio, the afternoon of Commencement day, June 11. All old students are most earnestly and cordially invited to be present.

AT NEW SHARON, IOWA

Union services closed at New Sharon, Iowa, May 10. There were more than two hundred converts, of which the Friends received fourteen. The people of the community cannot feel too grateful over the success of these efforts.

EARLHAM COLLEGE

PROFESSOR William Orville Mendenhall has been released from much of his work in the Department of Mathematics that he may develop at the college and within the limits of Indiana and Western Yearly Meetings Evangelistic, Missionary, Bible School, and other practical phases of church work. The definite effort of the college will be to assist in carrying out the recommendations of the Five Years Meeting as contained in the report of the Commission on the Meeting and its Pastoral Care. This is essentially constructive work and the co-operation and prayer of Friends are asked for, that it may be fruitful in extending the power and efficiency of our branch of the church. Correspondence solicited.

WORDS OF APPRECIATION

We quote the following from a recent letter received from a subscriber in the state of New York: "I wish thee all possible success in the good work. I met last fall a converted Catholic priest, who was at one time editor of an M. E. paper, who said that he received more help from THE AMERICAN FRIEND than any other paper on the list of exchanges. He said the paper should receive a large list of subscribers.

CORRESPONDENCE

BRISTOW, IOWA,

Fifth Month 16, 1914.

S. E. Nicholson:

DEAR FRIEND—In remitting my subscription for this year I wish to express my appreciation of THE AMERICAN FRIEND and also to endorse the idea of a conference of men. There are many things which might be done, it seems to me, to increase the efficiency of our branch of the church and to stimulate the enthusiasm and loyalty of our men by such a gathering.

One matter which I have suggested to a few Friends might be considered. There are probably several hundred young Friends in the teaching profession who are in the same position as myself, isolated from any Friends' meeting. The customary way for locating teachers is rapidly becoming the teachers' agency. Every year there are doubtless many places filled near Friends' meetings where a Friend would have at least an equal chance if any should apply. It has occurred to me that the Five Years Board of Education might well employ a secretary, part of whose duty would be to collect information from local meetings of prospective vacancies and to inform young Friends of the opportunities.

This would accomplish two things. First, it would locate many more of our young people near our meetings and save not only their activities but in many cases their membership with us. Also, by charging the customary fee for such service I believe it a conservative estimate to say that two or three thousand dollars might be secured each year for the use of the board.

Very sincerely,

R. E. MENDENHALL.

BOOKS RECEIVED

"Sunshine and Roses," by Edwin P. Haworth, published by the Rockhill Art Publishers, Kansas City, Missouri. Large 16 mo. hand bound and boxed in an art design. Sent prepaid, $1.25.

This is a volume of dainty lyric verse printed in two colors on cream colored suede book paper and handsomely bound in a beautiful color design printed in four colors. The author is a Friend, and he has endeavored to collect from his poetical works only those smooth flowing lyrics that tend to sing themselves into the hearts of their readers. These lyrical selections are of a high order and should have a wide circulation among Friends. Address E. P. Haworth, 2929 Main Street, Kansas City, Missouri.

NATHAN AND ESTHER FRAME

A letter received from Esther Frame under date of May 20, says that while she is sick and tired in her nerves, Nathan being so ill and weak, she is "still on victory side under the precious blood of Jesus Christ our Lord that cleanseth me from all sin." She says that Nathan is a great sufferer and asks for the prayers of all. These Friends who have served the church so long and who have been instrumental in winning so many thousands of souls for the kingdom in many cities of the land, will have the sympathy and prayers of all in their old age, now that the hand of affliction is upon them. They reside at 719 Quebec Street, Washington, D. C.

COMING TO AMERICA

Two groups of English young Friends are visiting young Friends in the United States this summer. The first group, which starts about June the 18th, consists of Raymond Whitwell, Robert Davis, Sylvia Marriage, M. Ethel Crawshaw, Margaret S. Thorp and Harriet M. Newman, with James G. Douglas representing Irish young Friends and Dublin Yearly Meeting. The later group will probably include Elizabeth Fox Howard and Olive Graham. Among the engagements of the visiting Friends a short stay at the Whittier Guest House is probable.—London Friend.

We have received copy of the Journal of the Friends' Historical Society of London for April. It is an interesting number and contains a variety of historic matters. There is a brief extract taken from the Minutes of London Yearly Meeting of Thomas Chalkley's brief account of Truth's Affairs in America, but in particular in Pennsylvania, written under date of 1709. There is also a statement concerning the proposed new and complete edition of the journal of John Woolman. Price per single copy of the journal is fifty cents, per year or four copies for the year, issued quarterly, $1.25. Address Friends' Historical Society, Devonshire House, London, E. C., England.

BIBLE SCHOOL LESSON

June 7.

Subject.—The Coming of the Kingdom.

Lesson.—Luke 17: 20-37.

Golden Text.—"Lo, the kingdom of God is within you."—Luke 17: 21.

From the beginning it was planned that Jesus should establish a spiritual kingdom and extend it to the hearts of men. The whole plan of redemption was to be systematized. There must needs be a successful issue to the preaching of the gospel message.

In the new kingdom the will of God was to be supreme. Discipleship was to be sonship and sonship meant heirship. Filial obedience and devotion was the requirement of all. Of this kingdom there should be no end.

It was not a kingdom to be proclaimed by marching hosts or beating drums or worldly display. There were to be no golden crowns, no officers of state, no stripes and no regalia. This kingdom "cometh not with observation."

In this their fondest hopes were dashed; the disciples saw their dreams fading away. For the first time possibly they began to understand. Customs were to be perpetuated. They would continue to eat and drink. Religion is not a matter of display. It lies not in the observance of days or in the proclamations of state.

This kingdom was to become a rule of life, a state of the heart, a relationship with God by the contact of spirit with spirit. And thus it has ever been and will ever be. Religion is a life, not a formula.

The Roman rule would be overthrown only as the principles of Christ became incorporated into its mechanism and its ideals were changed. It is by this manner that the kingdoms of this world are ultimately to become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ.

True to his custom, Jesus confounded the Pharisees by his answer to a catch question. He neither fell into the trap of saying that his kingdom was about to be ushered in temporarily nor the equally dangerous one of discouraging his followers by the statement that its coming would be postponed. He simply says that his kingdom is to come quietly in the hearts of all who believe.

Thus is his kingdom spreading today while the world rushes on with its daily whirl.

The Minneapolis Friends' Meeting wishes the names and addresses of all Friends who have come or expect to come to Minnesota. We invite those who pass through Minneapolis or St. Paul to arrange for stop-overs whenever possible. Address all communications to pastor, SAMUEL L. HAWORTH, 2212 Nicolet Avenue, Minneapolis, Minnesota.

A cordial welcome is extended to Friends coming to New York City and vicinity. Meeting houses, 144 East Twentieth Street, New York, and Lafayette and Washington Avenues, Brooklyn. Hour of worship, First-day, 11:00 a. m.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR

June 14.

Topic.—Twelve Great Verses. VI.
The Purity Verse.—Matt. 5: 8.

Purity is an essential characteristic of Godliness. The promise is to the "pure in heart." The poet sang, "His strength was as the strength of ten because his heart was pure."

What is true of persons is true of the social order, of government. The family, society, politics, all are under condemnation that follow not the rule of a pure life. The nation that sinneth shall die and impurity is sin.

He who argues that vice is a necessary evil is arguing against the counsels of God. Ask the older members to discuss the question of why God's condemnation is upon impurity. Ask each member to be prepared to quote a purity text.

DID THE WORK

Grew Strong on Right Food

You can't grow strong by merely exercising. You must have food—the kind you can digest and assimilate.

Unless the food you eat is digested it adds to the burden the digestive organs have naturally to carry. This often means a nervous breakdown.

"About a year ago," writes a Mass. lady, "I had quite a serious nervous breakdown caused, as I believed, by overwork and worry. I also suffered untold misery from dyspepsia.

"First I gave up my position, then I tried to find a remedy for my troubles, something that would make me well and strong, something to rest my tired stomach and build up my worn-out nerves and brain.

"I tried one kind of medicine after another, but nothing seemed to help me.

"Finally a friend suggested change of food and recommended Grape-Nuts. With little or no faith in it, I tried a package. That was eight months ago and I have never been without it since.

"Grape-Nuts did the work. It helped me grow strong and well. Grape-Nuts put new life into me, built up my whole system and made another woman of me!"

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

The Boston and Maine railroad grants no reduction in fares from Boston to Portland.

400,000 Settlers a Year

Immigration figures show that the population of Canada increased during 1913, by the addition of 400,000 new settlers from the United States and Europe. Most of these have gone on farms in provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Lord William Percy, an English Nobleman, says:

"The possibilities and opportunities offered by the Canadian West are so infinitely greater than those which exist in England, that it seems absurd to think that people should be impeded from coming to the country where they can most easily and certainly improve their position."

New districts are being opened up, which will make accessible a great number of homesteads in districts especially adapted to mixed farming and grain raising.

"Treasure in Heaven"

BY AMOS R. WELLS

Treasures of sound! Kind words, and words of love,
And helpful words, and merry songs of earth,
Yes, all your tender vocal ministries
Living forever on the upper air,
Borne to you on the winds of heaven's May,
And whispered to you deep in heaven's woods,
And gratefully repeated here and there
By unforgetting spirits—ah, the store
Of golden sounds from earth sent heavenward,
Echoed in happy tones for evermore!

Treasures of thought! Decisions firmly true,
Still meditations blossoming serene,
The gleam of high ideals followed far,
Bold aspirations, plans of perfectness
Outreaching brother arms to all the world,—
These, written in the libraries of heaven,
And printed deeply on celestial minds,
Are authorship indeed! a catalogue
That Shakespeare well might covet for his own.

Treasures of courage! Wealth of love and faith,
Of trust when trust becomes an agony,
Of hope when hope's last ray has fallen dead,
Of courage in the chasm of despair!
These are the pillars of the heavenly homes,
These are their statues, these their paintings proud,
The rich adornings of their palaces!
These are the treasures heaven cannot buy,
Or God create. The millionaires in these—
Some gentle mother spending all for love,
Some patient workman toiling manfully,
Some large-lived hero living for mankind—
Will walk in affluence eternally,
And none will grudge them, but the countless hosts
Will glory and rejoice to see them rich.

—C. E. World.

Joy in Living

BY MARCUS EMORY GUNN

With both soul and body thriving
There is joy in simply living,
With the buds and with the blossoms
In the grasses, on the trees;
With the voiceful mockbird's singing,
And the blacksmith's anvil ringing,
There is joy in full expression
With the humans, birds and bees.

Out from under condemnation
There is psychic sustentation,
And the amplest satisfaction
With the Saviour, Guide and Friend;
Peace like a river flowing,
Joy and gladness bright and glowing,
And a hope that is Eternal
With fruition ne'er to end.

Tompkinsville, Kentucky.

Why Not?

Friends' Indian Missions in Oklahoma

The regular annual meeting of the Associated Committee of Friends on Indian Affairs met in Philadelphia, May 13th and 14th.

The Chairman, Edward M. Wistar, presided, and there were present, aside from the Philadelphia Friends, delegates from New England, New York, Baltimore, Indiana and Western Yearly Meetings. The absence of delegates from several of the Yearly Meetings was much regretted by those present and a minute was passed suggesting that each Yearly Meeting affiliated with the work be requested to defray the expenses of at least one delegate to the meeting each year.

Hetty B. Garrett, who has served the Committee long and faithfully as Secretary, felt that she must retire from that position, and Susan J. Allen of Moorestown, N. J., was appointed in her place.

The resignation of the Superintendents, William P. and Abigail Haworth, who have had general charge for ten years of the mission stations in Oklahoma, was accepted with regret by the Committee and much appreciation was expressed for the faithful and efficient service rendered by these Friends. The resignation fortunately will not become effective until next fall.

By the report of the Superintendents it was learned that a total of 1,054 meetings had been held during the year at the ten mission stations, sixty-two Indians had professed conversion, and twenty-one had been received into membership with Friends. More than five thousand family visits had been made by the missionaries and over seven thousand papers distributed. The Treasurer's report showed that the total amount disbursed in carrying on this important work was $4,488.98.

One of the most interesting activities of the past year was the evangelistic work carried on at some of the missions by Daniel and Jennie Clinton and Ella Blackfish, full-blood Indians. Great good was accomplished by these earnest Christians as they carried the message of the Gospel to their own people.

A special work carried on by certain Friends interested in the work of the Associated Committee has been the support during the past year of a Kickapoo Indian girl at Friends University, at Wichita, Kansas.

The Committee expressed great interest and satisfaction at the report given by George N. Hartley of his activities within the limits of several Yearly Meetings, especially that of North Carolina, in speaking and in other ways stirring up a greater interest in the Indian work.

It is to be hoped that Friends everywhere will get new courage and inspiration for this great work on account of the good progress made during the past year. The Associated Executive Committee on Indian affairs has been in existence since 1869 and was the outgrowth of a concern for the Indians which arose in several of the eastern Yearly Meetings in 1795. Thus it is an old work committed to our hands by faithful Friends of an earlier day.

The Direct Method in Christian Work

We had the good fortune recently to participate in a conference of Christian workers, called to consider efficiency methods in the task of winning the multitudes for the kingdom of God. The customary program was urged with unusual clearness and with more than ordinary vigor. No one could fail to be impressed with the appeal of the religious experts who were in charge of the gathering.

The true evangelistic spirit characterized the whole discussion. The problem of reaching men in the shops, the methods of street corner evangelism, the Sunday afternoon theater meetings of the Y. M. C. A., the task of getting men into the devotional services of the Church were all considered and elaborated upon with zealous persistency.

The strangest part about the proceeding, as well as almost all such proceedings, was that apparently it did not occur to suggest the plan of reaching men in their own homes. There it is where most men are found at their best. It is in the home where man's sympathetic nature is most easily stirred, as he is made to view his responsibilities to those who have been committed to his care by the sacred ties of family life. By ignoring in large measure the problems of home visitation, the Christian world is failing to gather in a rich fruitage that can be had for the picking.

We have no controversy with social service in the large. We believe in it profoundly. We believe in stirring the social conscience, the business conscience, the political conscience and the neighborhood conscience in order that collectively human society may feel the regenerating touch of a gospel that is for all men. We have, nevertheless, a profound conviction that if our Christian Churches will develop an organism with the purpose in view of adding hand-picked converts to their rolls, gathered from homes by the personal visitation of magnetic Christian workers, the harvest will far excel in the aggregate the reaping of all the evangelistic campaigns that are now stirring the country.

Our purpose is not to condemn, nor even to minimize the splendid efforts of co-operative evangelism. Our concern rather is to awaken interest in a method that has largely been overlooked, but which has within it potentialities of soul winning that can no longer be ignored. There is literally no limit to the possibilities of such service.

It is the personal touch that counts most. Men may be and are moved in the mass by some great sermon, by some fervent appeal, but the far greater number will never yield to the claims of the gospel, and what is more, will never hear the claims of the gospel, unless the appeal be made by some sympathetic soul who has learned the secret of getting next to the hearts of men through friendly, social contact. Jesus sent out the seventy who went two by two into every home and by personal ministrations prepared the way for the Master's coming.

The Church has overlooked too long that social quality in its membership that always wins by the power of its sympathetic influence. It is that social quality which many men possess that makes them good mixers and therefore influential in the field of politics. It is that same social quality existing in many of the church membership that ought to be set at the task of winning whole families for the Church and the kingdom.

Nothing reveals and emphasizes the democratic nature of the Church so much as personal work. A church aristocracy that holds its skirts aside as the toiling masses go by will never win the world for Jesus Christ. The Church, as in no other age, is being challenged to be efficient. It must make good now in its professions of having a gospel that is intended for all mankind or suffer the penalty of exclusiveness. The gospel must be carried to the people where it will best reach them and the democratic plan of personal contact with men will succeed when other methods have failed.

Every local congregation needs to have in its organism that which will correspond to a personal workers' league. It may be a committee on invitation and personal work, but whatever the exact plan, certain qualified members need to be set apart, charged with the task of getting acquainted religiously no less than socially with their neighbors and winning them for the Christian life by the power of personal association. Within sight or certainly within easy reach of every local meeting are families that never hear the gospel preached, that feel the power of the Church in no direct way, simply because the Church has been content to wait until they got ready to place themselves within the circle of the Church's influence. It is time that the example of the good Shepherd were followed in going out after those who are wandering far from the fold.

Weakness Made Strong

BY ANDREW F. MITCHELL

To the unregenerate or natural man the Gospel contains many a puzzling paradox. One of them is expressed in the passage that God chooses the foolish, the weak, the base and despised to unfrock the boasting pride of man, and bring to naught things that are. The best faith which the world has seen has been furnished by men who through weakness were made strong.

The fact may not be greatly relished that man himself was made from dust, nor is it enhanced to know that this dust on its way to manhood passed through the intermediary of mud, slimy, filthy, putrefying mud and loathsome mire. The carnation and the rose with their winning fragrance are children of repulsive mud. The melon tribe, the vineyard and orchard fruits all draw their nectared sweets from soil one step from peat and bog and swamp. The farmer strews his faded fields with stinking phosphates and then reaps a harvest big from this infiltrated soil. The rich green leaves which drape the trees in beauty and become the enchanting tapestry of the forest, fade and fall by autumn frost and come down to join the mould of centuries and climb again through roots and trunks of trees to weave the grain of polished pine or quartered oak for the cottage or the palace.

This law of ascent is a thing of beauty and a joy forever. But let us look again. Can the earth claim so much? Can dirt alone put forth all these beauteous forms of life and enrich them with the perennial glow of summer? Is the rose earthborn alone? Has the cantaloupe but one parent? Does the peach obtain its blush from the cloud and midnight? Do leaves come down to choose their grave without hope?

It takes two worlds to make a dandelion. The fragrance of the flower, the nectar of the melon, the blush of the orchard and the ripened finish of the harvest is not wrought without the sun. This great unfailing orb can look earthward and say "without me ye can do nothing."

We must look above as well as below to see the completeness of any truth. God chooses the foolish to confound the wise; weakness and it becomes strength; the base and it becomes renowned; the despised and it becomes ennobled. That which claims no other parentage than the earth is doomed. The wages of sin is death, is an unchangeable fact, but over against it is the redemptive fact that the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord. God chooses weakness and it becomes strength.

It is interesting to note the ascent of inanimate matter climbing up through fern and flower into life; and then through the grass and granary, through field and factory, through bread and butter and beef and yielding itself to him who is commissioned to conquer, to subdue and have dominion. God has chosen the weak things to become the mighty.

He chose a heathen lad in Ur of the Chaldees and from its night He pointed a pathway to the morning that dawned upon a new day of promise. He transformed this lad into a tower of strength and knighted him as the father of the faithful, the greatest title of the old dispensation.

God chose again. He laid his hand upon an infant slave doomed to death by the order of a king, tutored in the royal household that had decreed his death until he was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians; transformed in the desert, he came back and played with the oppressor of his race as with a toy, rescued his people, organized a nation, gave it a constitution, reduced it to order and handed over to Joshua a people disciplined to obedience and loyalty, receiving evidence of the greatest lawgiver and statesman of any age. From Moses to Lincoln, God has been reaching down to the depths and lifting men up to emancipation and vision. Up is the pathway of redemption. Christian, Quaker, Methodist were given in derision, but are lifted up by sovereign grace and worn as coronets of great honor and transforming power.

From the manger to the throne, from the tomb to the right hand of the Father was the pathway of the Son. "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me." "Son of man stand upon thy feet and I will speak to thee." All the currents of life flow upward. If thou wilt make the most of this great gift of life, be instructed by the Inner Voice that speaks to thee, lay hold of God in Christ with all thy heart and he will lift thee up. Thy weakness committed faithfully to Him shall become enduring strength.

The Promise for the Peacemakers

BY J. R. MILLER, D.D.

No one of the Beatitudes has a greater promise than that for the peacemakers. "They shall be called the children of God," said the Master. This must be because they are like God. God is a peacemaker, and we become his children just in the measure in which we are peacemakers.

In one of the prophets, God reveals his desire for the peace of his people by saying: "I know the thoughts that I think toward you, saith the Lord, thoughts of peace." Always God desires his children to have peace. He wishes them to be at peace with him, to be reconciled to him, accepting his grace and love, and entering into fellowship with him. He wishes them to have his peace, the very peace of God, in their hearts, amid all the trials and sorrows of life. Christ bequeathed his peace to his friends. "My peace I give unto you." Then he wants them to be at peace among themselves. Strife between brothers is unseemly, undivine. If we are God's children we will share with Him all these desires for peace.

In a narrower sense, a peacemaker is one who seeks to cure dissensions, to bring together those who are in any way estranged, to remove misunderstandings, and to promote peaceable relations among men. It is a noble mission, one to which every follower of Christ should be heartily devoted. The blessing upon the peacemaker is so great, so exalted, so divine that everyone should be eager to win it.

One way to be a peacemaker is to live a peaceable life oneself. Perhaps there has been too little attention paid to the cultivation of the graces of Christian life. Doctrinal soundness has been insisted upon as a test of Christian life more than sweetness of spirit and beauty of character have been. An irritable temper is too often regarded, not, indeed, as a quality to be admired and commended, but, at the worst, as an excusable infirmity, one that must be charitably tolerated, a weakness so common among good people that no one can reprove his neighbor for it. So many Christian men and women are touchy and easily offended, so easily hurt and so likely to hold a grudge, that it seems necessary to leave a wide margin in defining what religion requires of its followers in the matter of patience and forbearance.

But the teaching of Jesus on this point is very clear. He insists on love, not merely as a fine sentiment, but as a quality of daily life, affecting all its relations and its contact with others. "I say unto you, Resist not him that is evil: but whosoever smiteth thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also. And if any man would go to law with thee, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also." There would seem to be no place left in this teaching for resisting wrong, for resentment, for retaliation. Certainly strife is not commended by our Master.

In the epistles, too, there is many an exhortation to peaceable living. For example, St. Paul counsels Christians, as much as in them lies, to live peaceably with all men. If there must be quarreling, it should not be the fault of the Christian. He must not begin it. It must not come through his insisting on his rights. He must do all in his power to get along with his neighbor without strife. If others are disposed to be quarrelsome, he must meet the disagreeable spirit with love, overcoming evil with good. "The finest thing about our rights," says George Macdonald, "is that, being our own, we can give them up."

According to the New Testament, whatever is unloving in act, word, or spirit is to be avoided. All malice, bitterness, clamor, and evil-speaking are to be put off, and all meekness, patience, kindness, and thoughtfulness are to be put on. We may do a great deal as a peacemaker by always keeping love in our hearts. In the Bahama Islands wells of sweet water are often seen near the sea. They rise and fall with the tide, and yet they are always fresh and sweet. As the water filters from the sea through the coral it loses its brackish saltiness. A Christian's heart should be such a well, sweetened by the grace of God and yielding only love, instead of nature's resentment and bitterness.

We may be peacemakers also by living so that it will be impossible for anyone to quarrel with us. The influence of such a life in a community works continually toward peaceableness. One contentious person can fill a whole neighborhood with strife. A quarrelsome man stirs up bitterness wherever he goes. But one person who has the forbearing spirit, who meekly endures wrongs himself rather than contend against them, is a maker of peace. Others are influenced by his example.—From "A Heart Garden."

Under What Conditions Does God Promise to Answer Our Prayers?

BY FRANCIS WRIGHT, SR.

One of the strongest promises in regard to prayer in the Bible is in John 16: 23. "If ye shall ask anything of the Father in my name, he will give it to you." There is no limitation in connection with this promise. What conditions have we a right to place upon it? We find many good people claiming that under this and other similar promises, their petitions must be fulfilled, and then when they are not fulfilled, we or they, try to account for it, by saying they did not ask for the right things, or they were not in the right spirit, or were harboring some secret sin, etc.

I believe we are justified in using one passage in the Bible to help interpret another, and we find that James says, Chapter 4, verse 3, "Ye ask and receive not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may spend it in your pleasures." But it seems to me that we have no right to apply this passage from James in limitation of John 16: 23, or certainly not to that in John 15: 16, "Ye did not choose me, but I chose you, and appointed you, that ye should go and bear fruit, and that your fruit should abide, that whatsoever ye shall ask of the Father in my name, he may give it to you." We have no more right to limit whatsoever, than we have to limit whosoever; and if we should limit whosoever, as so many people try to limit the above whatsoever, the great value of John 3: 16 would, in my judgment, be lost.

I prefer to believe that these passages indicate the giving of an unlimited power to a favored few who had been Jesus' personal companions for a period of three years, and whom he had chosen from a host of other disciples. But even of the twelve whom he chose, he himself said, John 6: 70, "Did I not choose you the twelve and one of you is a devil?" Does any one doubt that the latter passage applies to the twelve apostles and to no one else.

We find in John 13: 1, "Jesus * * * having loved his own that were in the world, he loved them unto the end," followed by what took place thereafter.

While I believe that the account in John 13th to 17th was recorded for our instruction, and that we do receive great comfort and inspiration from it, I do not believe that we have any justification for applying every promise made therein to ourselves, in the same sense that they applied to the twelve men, or rather the eleven, to whom most of them were addressed. After Judas went out, John 13: 31 commences, "When therefore he was gone out Jesus saith," and every word of Jesus after that was addressed to the eleven or some individual one of them. John 14: 25, "These things have I spoken unto you while yet abiding with you." 14: 28, "Ye heard how I said unto you I go away." 14: 29-30, "And now I have told you before it come to pass, that, when it is come to pass, ye may believe." "I will no more speak much with you." John 15: 3, "Already ye are clean because of the word which I have spoken unto you." John 15: 27, "Ye also bear witness because ye have been with me from the beginning." John 17: 12, "While I was with them, I kept them in thy name, which thou hast given me, and I guarded them, and not one of them perished, but the son of perdition," are samples of passages which I think applied only to the eleven, and with these I would include the unlimited promises in regard to the fulfillment of their petitions. Would it be a thing to be wondered at if Jesus did give them special promises not given to us? They had to undergo temptations that we can hardly appreciate; had to believe in his resurrection without any previous training as to the possibility of resurrection, such as we have had; had to encounter opposition such as we can hardly realize: and above all, they were his own personal friends as a man while he was in the body.

The close of the passage commencing John 17: 20, "Neither for these only do I pray," confirms me in the belief that much of what had preceded that expression must have been addressed, or implied directly only to the eleven.

There is another promise which I think was probably also only intended for the eleven apostles, Matthew 18: 19, "If two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father who is in Heaven." The preceding verse, "Whatsoever things ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in Heaven, and what things soever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in Heaven," surely does not apply to all Christians. When a young man, in the days of the Temperance Crusade, I attended a meeting to start such a Crusade at Lawrence, Kansas. Fervent prayers were made, and it was claimed God must answer them because there were more than two agreed. When the women's movement to close the saloons at Lawrence failed, my faith was sorely tried, but I have since learned to interpret these promises in a different way. To my mind, to take these promises such as I have quoted and make them apply to all Christians, and then explain their non-fulfillment, on the ground that these Christians are imperfect or unfaithful, is taking a greater liberty with the literal meaning of the passages than mine of limiting them to those to whom they were addressed can be.

I am reminded of the arguments against Christian Science. A man, raised a Friend, recently lost his wife from a cancer, which she had refused to have treated medically, believing it was being cured by Christian Science. His brother, an earnest believer in Christian Science, does not look on his sister-in-law's death as in any degree showing the inadequacy of Christian Science to preserve her life. Her death, according to him, simply proves she was not faithful to the teaching, or she would not have died. Are not those who claim the non-fulfillment of some of the promises in the Bible, on the ground of unfaithfulness on the part of those relying on them, really arguing in a similar circle?

Take the passage in Matthew 7: 7-11. That also is unlimited. "Ask and ye shall receive." "For everyone that asketh, receiveth." That does not apply to the twelve only, it applies to everyone, and imposes no conditions but the "asking." How then is it to be interpreted. The 9th and 10th and 11th verses explain it to me, with perhaps a liberal interpretation of them of my own. I note that the things the earthly father will not give are similar in appearance to the things asked for. Is it a straining of the simile to suppose a case of the child that thinks it sees bread or an egg, and asking for it is refused by the father, because he knows it is a stone or a scorpion, as the case may be? Have not all earthly parents had to refuse to give things to their children often and often, because they knew they were not what they really wanted, or were not best for them?

This, then, is my interpretation of God's promise to answer our prayers. He gives us in his own time and in his own way what he knows we need, and are really trying to ask for, or would if we knew how. "If we give good gifts" to our children, though not always the particular thing they ask for, "how much more shall your Father who is in Heaven give good things to them that ask him." How often we fail to see that our prayers are really being answered, because the answers do not come in the way we are expecting them.

Leaners

BY ORSON L. MILES

It has been said that, "In all forward movements in the uplift of humanity there are about twenty 'Leaners' to one 'Pusher'." However that may be, we do know that when we consider the Church's part in the uplift, speaking more particularly of our own, the Society of Friends, we find a state of lethargy that is appalling. As this is an age of investigation, we will dissect some of these "Leaners" and, perchance, we may be able to ascertain their malady and if we are successful we may be the better able to find the remedy.

It was the custom formerly in our Society, when one or both parents, they being members, requested it, the children became members also. This practice has been happily abandoned, but as the result we have some members that are just members, that is all, thus bringing discredit to the Society. Just "Leaners," still leaning on mother's knee; mother's knee, that has been bent so often in prayer to God in their behalf that they might know a personal Savior and an indwelling of the Holy Spirit continually. They are birthright members and are proud of it. No, sir! They did not have to join church, they were born into it.

While perhaps most of our earnest, active members are birthright members, there are so many who only take part in the work of the church spasmodically or are just "Leaners." There is the fellow who, when he gets out with a crowd of worldly and evil-minded men, will swear a little just to show them that he knows how.

We also have "Leaners" who object to paying a pastor to do the routine work of the Church that they would not think of doing themselves. You will hear some of them say, "Why, I work hard all week and come out here to Church on Sunday and don't get a cent for it either." It has been said, "You could put a thousand such souls in the shell of a mustard seed and shake it and they would rattle."

Then there is the fellow who quietly gives out the tip that he pays more for the support of the Church than anyone else. He knows it is not true when he tells it, but if he can get the people to believe it he can stand for one of the pillars of the Church and become quite dictatorial. He not only leans himself, but is a stumbling block for others.

We have the "Big revival Christians," also the person that always objects to all forward movements because "Friends are not in the habit of doing so," and he objects to "getting away from the customs and usages of Friends." He overlooks the fact, that, in founding the Society of Friends, its leaders strove to get away from "the customs and usages" and took a long step in advance; also that as conditions change the Church must also go forward and by the grace of God solve every new problem that arises.

Again there are "Leaners," not distinguished by sex either, who hold up their hands in horror if a member makes a misstep. You will hear them say, "Just as I expected! I never did have any faith in 'em, anyway."

They forget Christ's meeting with the multitude and Mary Magdalene. Brother! Sister! If you see one of these our brothers or sisters make a misstep, go to them with your love and sympathy and try to win them back to the Master. Perchance they are sorry for their misstep and a little sympathy will win them back again. Expect them to "stick," then maybe you will help them to do so. When you prophesy their failure you are more apt to help them to fall than to stand firm. Peter denied the Lord thrice; how many times have you?

And again there is the fellow who is carried away by a "hobby," it may be some new cult or even chasing after some old and discarded one. But like the boy astride the broomstick—he must ride something; let the Church take care of itself. Another "Leaner" is the fellow who always goes visiting on the Sabbath. He can't find time to go to Church; he tells you also how sorry he is to miss, but "So and So" has been expecting a visit from the family for some time and had said that she never was coming to see his wife again if he didn't bring the family up some Sunday.

These are a few of the "Leaners" who make a burden for the Church to carry. Brother! Sister! The next time you feel like leaning in these or any other manner, "Go, get you to your closet." There alone with God take an inventory of stock on hand. Ask Him to give you a pure heart, a new life and with it an earnest desire to help your fellow man. To win the world to Christ, we who profess to be followers of the Christ must so live and exemplify Him in our contact with the world that every one will know without the telling that our lives are hid with God through our Lord Jesus Christ.

"And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me."

DEAR FRIEND—Having read with interest Harold E. Trent's article in your issue of Fourth month second, entitled "The Moral Appeal Against the War Spirit," I venture to recommend to your readers two new books which deal with this question in a forcible way. The first of these, "The Passing of War," is written by a Canon of the Church of England; the second, "Christ and War," is by a member of the Society of Friends and is specially intended for Study Circle work. I have pleasure in enclosing a summary of Canon Grane's book, issued by the Yorkshire 1905 Committee.

English Friends and Foreign Missions

It is perhaps not generally known among American Friends to what extent English Friends are engaged in foreign mission work. We give below the report of the Friends' Foreign Mission Association to London Yearly Meeting this year, which contains much valuable information about the work at various stations, and reveals somewhat the magnitude of the operations among English Friends.
